The miners' strike has dominated political discussion for over a year. Put another way, more crap has been written about it from every hue of the visible political spectrum than about any other event.

Now Plaetime shuffles into the marketplace after it's all over, only to find itself alongside the jackals picking over every scrap of fallen 'truth'. There's a lot about the strike in this issue, so we should say now : it's not our intention to sell ourselves using the strike as a loss-leader, just as we haven't used it as a 'cause' that we could abandon ourselves to.

Class struggle in the mining communities is about our class—and thus in a sense about us, our own struggles, our own hopes. But in a more real sense it's not about us in London, ninety miles from the nearest pit.

Finding ourselves in the position of interested but largely helpless spectators, and in the presence of so many narcissists and politicians, it's hard not to feel a bit self-conscious writing about it. Why risk looking like one of them? Others are asking the same question. The silence now about the strike in some quarters is deafening, while the absence of sound from those now talking the loudest is even more marked.

So why? Because it is 'images' of the miners' strike which are painted on the backcloth behind every class struggle in Britain today.

The miners' strike began as an initiative by the strikers themselves, was maintained through the initiatives of the mining communities, and only ended when a majority of the strikers saw it wasn't going to achieve its object. The strikers' aim was to force the National Coal Board (NCB)/Government to cancel their plans for the industry—a programme of rapid closures involving 20,000 'voluntary' redundancies. In this they have been unsuccessful.

Talk now is of 20 closures over the next year (4/5 in South Wales, 2/3 in Scotland and the North East, 6 each in Yorkshire and the Midlands) and 50,000 redundancies. NCB Area Directors have been told to do an 'exercise' in seeing how many redundancies could be made without affecting production targets. As this is written, the struggle over the first two closures—Frances and Bedwas—is underway.

It's been said that the most remarkable thing about the strike was that it happened at all, after years of induced recession and insubstantial the 'realistic limits' can be.

It's no insult to the determination and courage shown by the majority of miners to point out that they still made relatively little effort to overcome the difficulties of extending the strike, as opposed to standing firm. In fairness to them, most strikers had a sensible view of what they might achieve. The aim was not proletarian revolution, but to stop the Macgregor Plan. Nevertheless once mass picketing had been defeated, it became a (very large) sit-at-home strike. It is still a tribute to them that it remained as determined as it had ever been, well after the point that power cuts and large-scale outsiders solidarity became unlikely, and the lack of resolve of the non-'militant' NUM leaders became obvious.

For some 'revolutionary observers' the NUM became the focus for their private ambitions, much as Solidaros has a couple of years ago. On the other side some tried to cast it as the 'new realism' it has bred amongst workers. (In fact we said this in the last issue.) This truism is used by many in a patronising sense. "Jolly good show, chaps! Pretty good effort, even the sticky wicket you were playing on!". As if defeat was inevitable. Absolute rubbish. In fact, the strike provides a basic lesson in the nature of mass class struggle. That it arises from the anger generated by specific and usually local grievances, but once the ball has been set rolling it achieves a momentum of its own.

The hardline National Union of Mineworkers (NUM) leadership had been trying to get a national strike for some years, and had been rebuffed in a series of votes. They were as surprised at the development of this strike as anyone else—but knew, for all the problems (bad timing, no planning, high coal stocks, etc.), that this was the only chance they were going to get. They worked hard to make the best of a bad job.

The union didn't plan the strike, and neither was it some sort of logical 'miners next step' in response to the effects of the build-up to restructuring. (Not just the job losses through closures, but those through mechanisation and reorganisation. And the speed-ups and increased work discipline for those left. All against the background of the grievances over pay). But bad as the effects were, workers as 'militant' as the miners have stoically put up with worse. Equally the walkout at Cortonwood colliery wasn't the first local strike against a closure since the present round of restructuring began. This time, as the strikers' anger led a minority to step outside 'new realism', it gave both them and the majority of their fellow miners a new perspective on what acting realistically could mean. The way in which this struggle erupted—and was pursued—against the odds, shows how

Mr Benn, MP for the mining constituency of Chesterfield, reiterated his belief that the whole Labour movement ought to be preparing for a general strike in defence of civil liberty and free trade unionism.
He said: "With the banning of the trade unions at Cheltenham, the destruction of the GLC, the possibility they may put Arthur Scargill in jail, people have got to make up their minds — are we going to sit and watch it on the telly or start thinking about it."
ports which kept coal imports relatively low makes exports equally difficult, and many countries will not accept British coal which has a high chlorine and sulphur content.

It will not be seen how far the NCB has ‘won’ until the extent to which the strike has gone ‘underground’ in the pits is known. That will be fairly soon, because the most important orders the NCB has are to restock CEGB power stations, which means the NCB being able to deliver large quantities of coal rapidly.

The effect of any large-scale restructuring exercise isn’t simply to break workers’ resistance. It is also to break the entrenched power of senior and middle management. The disputes within the NCB executive and with NACODS were not by-products of the ‘real fight’ but essential elements of the NCB hard-liners strategy for the coal industry. It’s clear that NACODS members are as little pacified as the other workers.

So far the evidence is that the NCB will by no means have things all its own way. That can be seen in the spate of small local disputes since the return to work. Restructuring may not be stopped, but the price extracted for it in obstructionism and non-co-operation could eat deeply into the bosses’ profits.

The fact that significant numbers of the miners seem still prepared to have gone it alone for the NCB. And in the terms the NCB themselves measure victory and defeat, all they have done is create an opportunity which they still have to successfully exploit.

Sir Alfred Sherman, an ex-Marxist, who is one of Mrs Thatcher’s most ideological advisers, also chose the language of the Left to attack the miners. Coal miners, he argued in The Times (21 June 1984) were not ‘generating surplus value but deficit value, hence they exploit their fellow workers’. They represent ‘sheer conservatism, attempting to preserve nineteenth century patterns of employment’ and fetishise ‘what Marx called “rural idiocy” in an isolated, quasi tribal, one-class society’.

Another disturbing indicator of how the strike was not bitting deep enough to expose the real issues at stake is the general lack of understanding of how the strike fitted into a wider social context—the place of coal in British energy policy. While some people frothed at the mouth about the ‘Tory plot to destroy coal, the Labour Party produced alternative capitalist plans for the exploitation of coal and the capitalists who depend on it. The NUM circulated bizarre ideas, for example a commitment to put chimneys in new council houses. They might have added air conditioning and tumble driers to overcome the effects of the pollution this would cause. They also made great claims for the alternative technologies for exploiting coal, which the NCB has been half-heartedly experimenting with. This stream of propaganda about the role and future of the industry found no counter at all from ‘revolutionary’ circles (except tortured debate among the ecologically-minded).

The Macgregor Plan is about ensuring that coal will play an admittedly reduced, but still absolutely crucial role in energy policy, at least until the next century. That is what the strike was about. How to reorganise the industry to ensure this. The government, far from wishing to abandon coal, is inextricably dependent on it. They stopped the Gas Board buying bargain-price gas from Norway during the strike precisely because it would have undermined coal’s market competitiveness.

Oil has proved to be black dynamite rather than black gold. Gas faces a medium-term future at best unless alternative sources of supply are developed for when North Sea gas runs out. New, fair enough, experiments in liquefaction—coal into oil—and gasification—coal into gas—are being conducted. But while extraction efficiency has been improved, no substantial progress has been made about economically filtering pollution. Acid rain being another Bogey over which the government is out of step with its more ‘green-conscious’ EEC competitors. More basically, the state doesn’t have the money to develop such schemes on more than a token basis. For the Labour Party of course, this is just a problem of investment—the problem where this investment is to come from remains deliberately unanswered. Because it is to come from a more efficient exploitation of us.

Nuclear power—the favoured choice in the CEBG for a primary energy source—is politically extremely sensitive and immensely, perhaps prohibitively, expensive. It is not even certain to what extent new capacity in energy production is required, since the CEBG, and following them the coal industry in the 70s via Plan for Coal, have proved to have based development plans on grotesque overestimates of future energy demands.

Energy policy is so politically loaded that governments of whatever party actively discourage debate about it. Combined with the NUM and NCB’s self-interest in pushing coal regardless, it’s not surprising that people take up the disinformation on offer. What’s disturbing is how little this disinformation and the built-in presuppositions of what sort of society we want aren’t effectively challenged.

But what had been won on the picket line? Among the miners themselves the limits imposed on picketing have occasioned some searching inquests. But not on the hard Left. Nor has it wondered why traditional industrial action has nowhere matched the breathtaking solidarity spanning NUPE domestics in Belfast, printers in London, lesbians and gays, black workers and Greenham women... sending money, food, entertainment, love and affection... and pickets. It’s a relationship that has brought a cultural revolution in the coalfields.

The miners’ strike reveals clearly that traditional strike strategy is ineffective against the state, particularly when it has prepared itself to meet the specific strike strategy employed. The miners took up the same tactics as in 1972 and 1974 because the strike started relatively spontaneously and there was little opportunity for them to plan anything different. Particularly given that many of the strikers would probably have voted against a strike if a ballot had been held a few weeks before. The tactics worked in 72 not because they were especially innovative or subversive, but because they took the state by surprise.

Revolutionaries have been pointing out the failure of the tactics used in the strike right from the start. Indeed, we’ve added our own fivepennyworth. There’s no point in going through the fallings of this armchair generalship at length—but one or two points should be made. The agreement now by so many that the NUM
Mrs Marsland said: "We have to mobilise our women and time our women as they have been used so effectively within the dispute in the NUM."

Mrs Gilbert said: "These women are hungry to take their place in society. We would look to see positive action by the TUC to aid the education and politicisation of these women."

The involvement of women from the mining communities in the strike was also notable. That said, the fact that people take an active part in struggles doesn’t mean that activity is automatically going to take a radical direction—though it certainly did for many of them. Similarly, the sort of ‘community spirit’ and solidarity developed in many areas is always ambiguous, and not necessarily connected in any meaningful way with the community spirit in what remains of London’s docklands. However, we must acknowledge that once again we undoubtedly suffer from hearing so much of what we have about these aspects of the strike through the use of them by entirely reactionary political groupings.

Events don’t keep pace with deadlines, especially ones as meaningless as Playtime’s. This was only the latest of a whole series of articles about the miners’ strike produced by different Playmates over recent months. For an alternative look by another of us, see the last three pages of this issue.

There are a number of groups supporting imprisoned miners and their families. Here are a couple of them. This isn’t an endorsement of the political analysis adopted by either group—it is a statement of our belief that money will get to where it’s said it will, and that information given them about prisoners will not be abused.

Class War Prisoners Aid are writing to prisoners and collecting money for their families. They are open to suggestions for other activity. Contact them c/o “Unwaged Fightback”, 355 Holloway Road, Islington, London N7. (Tel. 01-607 8271/2) Money can be sent or taken to the above address. Cheques should be made out “Max Holz Committee”.

The National Organisation of Miners, Prisoners and Supporters (NOMPAS) are collecting information about miners facing trial and in prison, as well as money to assist them. Joint Secretaries: Geoff Coggan and Martin Walker. They will be publishing material about the situation of the miners in court and in prison, and the aftermath of the strike in the coalfields. The dealers in political ‘avant-gardes’ leap in to transform the activities of hit squads and support groups into political commodities, to be sold to the rest of the working class. It’s been sickening to watch the speed with which individuals were interviewed or photographed and turned into symbols. Or the ease with which ‘quotes’ were picked out of what they had to say and invested with a General Significance. All to provide a background of imagery for the political commentators who presented themselves as the real actors in this theatre of struggle.

Given the level of distortion, the illusions many built up about the hit squads and the ‘miners’ wives’ (as the women were invariably described) are understandable. But really uncomfortable.

The level of the initiatives within the mining communities at all these levels is one of the things that distinguishes this fight from others in recent years. It is to be hoped that now the strike is over, more accurate accounts may emerge alongside the torrent of mythology.

The emergence of significant instances of class violence is one of the most positive aspects of this strike. For once workers could be seen acknowledging the violence that characterises our exploitation in this society, and responding appropriately. That said, the myths have to be attacked. The vast majority of miners were never prepared for the level of violent escalation that might have turned the struggle in their favour in its last months. Indeed there were a number of ironies involved. Many strikers explained their defence of their communities as a determination to avoid the divisions, demoralisation and violence they saw in the decaying urban centres. Only to suffer varying degrees of lasting division, demoralisation and violence as a result of their struggle. While the lack of sympathy with class violence felt by most workers elsewhere related precisely to the fears about violence generated by the conditions the miners were struggling to avoid.

"WE HAVE been given a gift!" said one delegate to the TUC women’s conference yesterday on the key role played by women in the miners’ strike. "The strength of these women—we must take it with both hands!"

The ‘national’ and ‘mass’ dimension of the strike gave it a special significance for some militants, who seem to be suggesting that that’s what real class struggle is, as opposed to what happens constantly throughout class society. In fact, mass strikes are just ‘hot war’, as distinct from the perpetual ‘cold’ war under capitalism. Saying that mass struggles have a potential to spread and have effects well beyond their initial objectives is one thing. But it’s hard not to conclude that those militants attach such importance to large-scale ‘public’ and hence visible struggle because it is public and visible. Intervention doesn’t then mean an expression of solidarity, so much as making ‘contact’ with the class struggle as if it wasn’t going on around us every day of our lives. Unless discussion of mass struggle is related to some attempt to understand the general level of class struggle going on all the time, it risks becoming seen as a political event. somewhere ‘out there’, to be responded to politically.

Those wailing the loudest about what a crushing defeat the miners suffered are precisely those who saw the strike as a political gesture. For example, the ‘Eurocommunist’ tossers in the Communist Party who called for a coalition of the miners with the radical forces in society—the Greenham women and CND. A theme which no less than Arthur Scargill took up in speeches immediately after the return to work, reflecting the lack of a militant role for the NUM in the local struggles going on. This revealed clearly how distant its aims were from those miners struggling for specific concrete objectives.

Rather than dwelling on defeat, shouldn’t we be saying something about the positive aspects of the strike? Here we come up against an immediate difficulty. We are as well-placed as proletarians anywhere else in Britain to comment on the overall struggle and its background. When it comes to specifying initiatives by the strikers and within mining communities, especially by women, our views are second-hand at best. In addition to our geographical distance from it (one not broken down by ‘day trips to see the miners’), most of our sources of information about these initiatives are wholly unreliable. Right from the word go.
About Playtime

The Reality
Workers Playtime, the revolutionary answer to The Face, is collectively edited, typed, designed and printed by a tiny clique of rich, talented and extremely glamorous people.

The Myth
After the long illness and death earlier this year of the London Workers Group (LWG), to which most of us belonged at one time or another, Workers Playtime began to take on the functions of a fully-autonomous fifth-revolution political life-support system (a group).

What happened to the LWG, which at its best was a vehicle for transsectarian discussion and activity, showed the present tendency for revolutionaries to fragment into series of separate activist or ideological 'rumps'.

Apart from anything else, this issue of Playtime should reflect our dissatisfaction with this state of affairs. For us, corresponding with and talking to like-minded people becomes at the same time more difficult and more important than ever. Up to now, we have relied almost entirely on informal contacts for criticism and a wider discussion of what we were doing. Even so, there was very little useful feedback from those people who claimed to read the paper. This is one reason why we seize on almost any response as an excuse for a lengthy reply (see Nationalism Today and What is Playtime Standing In?). And why the paper sometimes seems like a gigantic wind-up, as we try harder and harder to provoke our reader to retaliate.

So the appeals for comment, criticism and contributions are not just a libertarian ritual. We are repeating it now. It makes a lot of difference to our desire and ability to continue (and no, we will not take an empty postbag as a clear signal that you want us to pack it in.) In return, we promise to try and deal properly with the letters and publications we receive. Also, we'd be happy to meet people face-to-face, formally or informally, in London or wherever you are—drop us a line.

In the near future we plan to have a readers' meeting which we hope you'll try and come to (there aren't many of you). It will not be just another boring political meeting if we can help it. Get in touch if you're interested.

If you do write an article or letter for publication, please try and make it as long or as short as it deserves to be, and that doesn't necessarily mean following the example of past and present Playtimes. We don't have an editorial line or political code for contributors—but that doesn't mean we won't know what's wrong with you, and we don't guarantee to print anything (you think this stuff's bad? You should see some of the things we wrote and threw in the bin.) It doesn't have to be about workplace struggle or capitalist politics either—that's just been the majority fetish of Playmates in the past. We don't regard these as the only important things—some are more important than its appearance elsewhere. In future we hope that the content of Playtime will show this more clearly. We would particularly like to get accounts of struggles that people are themselves involved in, or close to.

We promise to interfere with contributions as little as possible, but please be prepared to discuss them before they are printed, and maybe make changes. That means letting us know how we can contact you, after you've sent us something.

This is the first issue of Workers Playtime for six months. Reasons/excuses are hinted at elsewhere—dare you doubt them? To our certified and committed readers, we apologise for the delay; to the rest, sorry for reappearing. By way of compounding the crime on both sides, this is a bumper double issue.

After being off the streets (well, the shelves of lefty bookshops) for so long, we've come up with what we regard as a class issue—this glossy stuff fell off the back of a bankrupt printshop. The articles, though, are the usual collection of space-fillers, and next time it'll be back to the usual bog-standard paper.

We aren't assisted by the GLC, CIA, or South American millions as far as we know (but thanks to Aldgate Press, 01-247 3015, for help.)

You on the other hand could do a lot by:

Subscribing (£3.00 inland and overseas surface mail, £4.00 air mail.)

Taking a bundle of 5 or more copies, at a discount of 25% on the cover price. We pay postage and packing.

Buying a complete set of 9 back issues. £2.00.

Sending us all your money.

Please don't make out cheques or money orders to 'Workers Playtime', because we still don't have a bank account. Instead, leave the name of the payee blank. Send them, together with letters, articles, graphics, complaints, ideas, recruits, death threats etc. to us at this address:

Aims & Principles
Adopted from those formulated by the Calderwood 15

One of the difficulties that has beset the production of this issue of Playtime has been our lack of programmatic clarity. We had reached the point of wondering whether Playtime would ever appear again when we received a copy of the Aims and Principles of the Calderwood 15 from Glasgow. This so exactly expressed our unformalised moves towards political coherence that the invisible dictatorship behind Playtime has decided, in line with our views on democracy, that Playtime will adopt the platform as a first step in the increasingly essential task of achieving a meaningful national regroupment of the revolutionary milieu. A 100% vote to this effect will take place at the next International of our fraction. The clarity we have achieved by adopting these guidelines for communist practice has provided the POLITICAL will to complete this report to the class and to commence planning the future of our tendency.

1 WP rigorously oppose the fundamentalist application of the neo-essentialist meta critique to everyday life.

2 That meta critique is IN ITSELF merely a PARTIAL critique of the PREVAILING EXTINGENCIES observed to be determinant in the modern world.

3 Organisational fetishism—i.e. that which is the unconscious expression of this mediated social milieu REALISES this abstracted (...) in its inverted form.

4 Language, like consciousness, only moves from the need, the necessity of intercourse with other (wo)men (sic).

5 If Lenin existed it would be necessary to REINVENT him.

6 That the neo-essentialist meta critique has gained mass recognition is TANTAMOUNT to the PREMATURE RECUPERATION of self-activity.

7 This sensuous self-activity, deriving from the SPECTACULAR REPRESENTATION OF THE GLISTENING COMMODITY, demonstrates the historical development of the workers movement.

8 The class must IMMEDIATELY seize the means of reproduction and replace the structures of domination with their liberated desires.

9 The banal meta language of sport will be measured to the needs of the participants.

10 Capital and its NATURAL CONCOMITANT the State, having FULFILLED their historical role, have SUCCumbed, at this juncture to the IMMANENT POWER OF THE WORKERS COUNCIL.

11 We reject the mystification of infantile jargonism. The revolution is realised in the clarity of programmatic analysis. Thus, we strive at all times for simplicity and directness in word and deed.

12 Capital's invasion of all aspects of everyday life and its colonisation of all forms of social relationships must in itself lead us to a rejection of all relationships and the establishment of a critique of all forms of human interaction under the prevailing conditions of modern capitalism in its decadent phase.

13 The collective self-transformation implicit in unmediated revolutionary struggle is best achieved within a structure of federated autonomous grouplets. The impossibility of collective action unfettered by the snapping guard-dogs of internalised capitalist ideology and the modified neo-essentialist critique of the hamstringing of the free flow of human creativity under the prevailing forms of oppression, mean that the optimum size of such grouplets should be less than two.

14 WP does not aspire to the leadership but merely succeeds in bringing the torch of enlightenment to the class.
MIRAGE COMMENT

AS HE HEARD THE NEWS THAT THE MIRAGE GROUP'S MERCY FLIGHT HAD REACHED ITS DESTINATION OUR PUBLISHER MOHAMMED MUNSHWAL SPOKE FOR US ALL:

"THIS IS GREAT NEWS!"

"I AM DELIGHTED WE HAVE BEEN ABLE TO CUT THROUGH THE BLUE TAPS AND GET THE SUPPLIES TO WHERE THEY ARE NEEDED. OUR READERS CAN FEEL PROUD OF THE PART THEY HAVE PLAYED. THEY HAVE NOT PASSED BY WITH DOWNCAST EYES - NOW LET'S ALL EYES DOWN AND MAKE IT A MILLION FOR THE MIRAGE APPEAL!"

"BUT THE CHALLENGE FACING ALL OF US IS HOW TO DEAL WITH THE CAUSES OF DISASTER AS WELL AS ITS EFFECTS. LIVING AS WE DO IN NATIONS WHERE THE DESTRUCTIVE FORCES OF HUMAN NATURE HAVE BEEN ELIMINATED THE HORROR OF COAL FAMINE IS ALMOST UNIMAGINABLE."

"WE MUST UNITE TO BRING AID TO THE SUFFERING PEOPLE OF THE WESTERN ISLES. BUT ONCE UNITED WE CANNOT REST UNTIL PRODUCTION, CLASS STRUGGLE AND ALL THE OTHER DISASTERS OF HUMAN NATURE HAVE BEEN CONQUERED AND SWEEP INTO THE HISTORY BOOKS. THIS IS THE MESSAGE OF HOPE THE MIRAGE GROUP PLEDGES ITSELF TO CHAMPION. THIS IS THE VISION OF THE NEW TOMORROW WE MUST ALL FIGHT TO REALISE."

GOD YOU'VE ARRIVED

"Here-we-go, Here-we-go, Here-we-go..." To the daze of a tribal brass band 3,000 frail children greeted a song of welcome and happiness. The Mirage Group's mercy convoy had arrived at a dusty village square in the heart of Britain's Coal Famine disaster area. But the message was not just for us but for the millions of big-hearted Daily Mirage readers whose donations have brought vital food, and drugs to the village of tears, where each dawn brings its new crop of bodies to swell the numbers lying at rest in the catacombs cut hundreds of feet in the rock below.

It was only this morning that I rode into this living hell with the first of the trucks, at the end of our gruelling 400 mile trek past the ghost towns of Shotton and Corby, across some of the worlds toughest territory. It is a region whose normal population has swollen to ten times normal size with an influx of blue robed, armed nomads from the worse hit desert regions to the south. There it is rumoured many of the population are forced to survive on brown rice and lentils.

Crowds of kids ran along side our vans on spindly legs waving wildly and gleefully shouting their word for a black man. Tonight the first of the supplies are being handed out to the desperately hungry families to whom it means the difference between life and death.

Excited urchins, some of them almost too weak to salute, gazed wide eyed as our supplies of black pudding, pork scratchings and mushy peas were unloaded in the scuffy market place.

Pushing forward, her little face eagerly uplifted, a two year old girl held up a bony hand for her bright orange mug to be filled with Tetley's Bitter. She smiled her thanks and clutched my trouser leg tightly as she gracefully gulped it down.

"This is the kind of help we need," said a desperately overworked local official of Libya's Miners Christmas Appeal Fund, "One mug of Tetley's is worth a thousand do-good women's committees sitting around trying to make up their minds."

Yards away from us a young mother clutching her starving six month old baby in her arms. Suddenly in an unfortunate gesture she held her wizened and wasted baby boy high above her head, the emaciated infants sunken eyes staring out full of sadness and suffering.

That frantic mothers moving cry for help and thousands more like it are being answered tonight as our shipment is distributed - the first aid from the East to get directly through to the stricken areas.

From Wall Pilla in Edlington, Britain, Saturday

AID ROW PROBE

As the Mirage Mercy Flight brought hope to the stricken regions of Britain, a new scandal erupted over the distribution of aid by the country's ruling Reaganite junta. Russian aid organisations last night confirmed reports that shipments of millions of tons of coal were being stockpiled in Government yards instead of being distributed to British furnaces. The vital shipments paid for by Polish and Vietnamese workers had been rushed to Britain to stave off the disaster that threatens as the electricity system collapses.

Off-the-record British Government sources blamed transport problems for the failure to distribute the aid, while official spokesmen refused to comment on allegations of corruption and incompetence.

Eastern aid organisations have made official complaints about the British Government's failure to deal with the civil unrest which is hampering their work.

In the worst hit areas villagers huddled around crude communal fires built using fuel from their now useless vehicles. Where this has run out there have been reports that Government buildings have been torn apart in the desperate search for fuel.

But while this tragic Rome burns the Ncar's of Westminster are fiddling the books. To the hard hearted totalitarian rulers of Britain keeping their hands on the reins of power supply is more important than the ruin, despair and violence they are reaping.
When a national dock strike was announced by the TGWU leadership from midnight on 9th July, it might have seemed that, for the first time in the current miners’ strike, there was the real possibility of a ‘second front’ being opened up in the class struggle.

The same basic issue was at stake in both industries: job security. Many dockers had already shown a degree of solidarity with the miners by blacking coal and iron ore movements. Even the bourgeois press and TV was carrying statements like “soon, no doubt, miners and dockers will be joining each other on the picket lines”, and putting out dire warnings about the consequences of the strike continuing.

By the time the first strike had collapsed, it was beginning to look as though they needn’t have worried.

The strike was called by the T&G’s national docks committee, after British Steel used workers who were not registered dockers, to unload iron ore at Immingham dock on the Humber. The ore in question was bound for Scunthorpe steelworks, and had been blacked by Immingham dockers in support of the miners. The steel corporation was directly contravening the terms of the National Dock Labour Scheme which reserves dock work for registered dockers while providing them with job security and large redundancy payments to encourage them to leave the industry.

The union’s case was partly that British Steel had been asked not to bring in private contractors to move ore until the outcome of the July 9th coal negotiations was known. In other words, the union leaders had been hoping that by then some kind of deal would have been cobbled together over the miners’ strike, so the dockers could be kept out of it.

The effect of the national strike call was to push the issue of how to organise effective blacking of coal and iron ore neatly to one side, turning it into a national disagreement within the dock industry between the T&G and the National Association of Port Employers (NAPE) over the precise terms of the DLS. At the same time, it played upon the dockers’ real fears about the future of the scheme, which has come under greater and greater pressure from the government and employers, as the volume of port trade has declined and dockers have become less and less willing to take voluntary redundancy, as unemployment has risen.

This pushing-aside of the blacking issue was made apparent as soon as the strike was called, when a train-load (equivalent to perhaps two road convoys) of iron ore was taken from Immingham to Scunthorpe unhindered. Furthermore, on the fourth day of the strike (July 13th) there were talks between NAPE and the T&G. British Steel — which is represented in NAPE as a port employer — said they had employed a specialist operator to load trucks with a mechanical shovel: it was just that they couldn’t find dockers who were prepared to be paid to observe the work (as was standard practice). BS were, however, perfectly prepared to square everything with the DLS by training dockers to use the equipment. The union negotiators’ reply to this was not to affirm that the ore was blacked in any case, but to call for a guarantee that the employers would do everything possible to avoid a breach of the scheme rather than leaving it for the Dock Labour Board to sort out.

The 13000 registered dockers in the DLS ports stopped work as soon as the strike was called, but the major non-scheme ports (around 22000 dockers are outside the scheme), such as Felixstowe, Dover, Harwich and Newcastle, carried on working. The effect of the stoppage at this stage was to strand 75% of cargo along with over 100 tankers and cargo ships although there was every possibility that cargo could be rerouted through non-scheme ports.

Throughout the strike, there were almost no picketing initiatives. This is not something which can be put down to any reluctance to participate in the strike by the dockers, or even to bureaucratic union control of the strike. The simple fact is that there has been traditionally very little reason for dockers to picket out other dockers. Until recent years, they had in trouble, and strikes were usually relatively solid. For various reasons — the relative security that the dockers have gained, the destruction of dockland communities, and so on — striking dockers can no longer rely on this sort of "automatic solidarity", any more than the miners can.

On July 14th, Felixstowe finally voted to join the strike, but they were not prepared to disrupt passenger services. The previous evening, a ban called by the National Union of Seamen (NUS) on Sealink freight transport began. This was in protest at the privatisation of Sealink, and opened up the possibility of Dover dockers becoming involved, because many of them are in the NUS rather than the T&G (although subsequent events were to show that union divisions remained as firm as ever.)

On Monday July 16th, Dover voted to stop all freight, but on the same day tugmen in Swansea went back to work as did 200 dockers at two oil industry supply depots. In neither case did other dockers do anything to counter this.

TURNING THE QUAY

Over the next couple of days, the reluctant strikers of Dover were given just the excuse they'd been waiting for when lorry drivers began to blockade channel ports in protest at not being able to take their lorries onto the ferries. It began with a small number of owner-drivers using their lorries to block the entrance to the Townsend-Thoresen ferry at Calais, and quickly spread to Dunkirk, Ostend and Zeebrugge. Around 300 lorries which had been parked on the M20 for the duration of the strike began to move off in convoy for Dover, to negotiate with the Harbour Board. By the next day, the dockers' shop stewards had called off the freight ban "because of fears of violence in the port".

Much was made by the press and TV of the fact that many of the lorry drivers were in the T&G. While it is true that there was an almost complete absence of solidarity from lorry workers (as there has been during the miners' strike), this obscures the fact that a large number of the drivers, including the initiators of the blockades, were self-employed owner-drivers. These petty-bourgeois scum have never had any sympathy towards striking workers, which is not entirely surprising, since their class interest in a narrow sense lies in pursuing their businesses above all else. The only reasonable proletarian response is to burn their lorries.

With the precedent set by Dover, the strike quickly collapsed. The next day there were votes all over the country to return to work.

At the same time the NUS called off its ban on Sealink freight and decided to talk to Sealink's new bosses, Sea Containers, instead. Jim Slater, General Secretary of the NUS, said the union did not want to appear to be "dragging them to the negotiating table". Meanwhile, the dock employers made no promises whatsoever about future breaches of the DLS. They just reaffirmed their commitment to the existing procedure. Adding insult to injury, the T&G's national docks officer John Connolly described this as a "great victory!"

BOLLARDS TO THE UNION

When a national strike was called again just over a month later, it's hardly surprising that it was less enthusiastically supported, with most dockers presumably adopting the fatalistic attitude that "if the T&G are running the show it must be a waste of time" and very few attempting to take the struggle into their own hands in any significant way. That the reluctance to strike cannot just be put down to the dockers' 'apathy', or unwillingness to join a 'political' strike in support of the miners, can be seen from the fact that in Northumbria, dockers respected miners' picket lines at docks bringing in coal even while they themselves were ignoring the strike call.

This time, the strike was called in response to the BSC allowing a coal ship called the Ostia to dock at Hunterston in Ayrshire, without T&G boatmen to moor the ship. They used a local contract firm instead. The T&G had blacked the ship after talks had broken down between the T&G and BSC over the level of coal and iron ore supplies to Ravenscraig steel works.

In Scotland, dockers responded immediately with solid strikes in all 12 scheme ports. None of the large non-scheme ports in England joined at any stage, and the situation in the English scheme ports was a complete mess, with dockers either unable to decide whether they were in or out, or serious splits within ports. For example, on the second day of the strike, dockers at Grimsby and Immingham voted to work, only to reverse their decision two days later, resulting in 400 striking and 260 working.

In the first week, there was a series of confused mass-meetings. In Bristol, the meeting on Tuesday broke up in confusion after shop stewards refused to allow a vote. In a vote at Tilbury on Thursday, shop... stewards tried to blatantly rig the vote by means of a confusing resolution which led many dockers to believe they were voting for a return to work, when in fact they were voting to strike. Two days before, 600 dockers had held an unofficial meeting and voted to return — but only 40 of Medlock Bibby’s (a sort of dockland “Silver Birch” figure) merry band of scabs dared to cross the picket line. This scenario was repeated in many other ports.

By the second week, the strike had more or less settled into the following pattern; over half the scheme dockers were out (7500-8000 out of 13000) and almost none of the non-scheme dockers were. On the Wednesday, John Connolly had said that although the strike was over, “scab labour”, it could be resolved through lower coal quotas for Ravenscraig. In other words, having sabotaged possible solidarity action during the first strike by shifting attention onto the workings of the Dock Labour Scheme, this time around they could safely make a gesture to the miners and at the same time sabotage the second strike by quietly shelving the issue of the DLS.

In the second week, there were quite a few attempts to picket out the working ports, with Southampton dockers unsuccessfully picketing Felixstowe, Portsmouth and Poole, and by the third week some miners were joining the picketing of Grimsby and Immingham (several hundred of them being turned back by the fifth, as were 50 Hull dockers.)

In the middle of all this, the T&G leadership declared that picketing must be stepped up providing, of course, it was within TUC guidelines. These had been drawn up between the TUC and the Callaghan government after the Winter of Discontent of 1978-79. Essentially what they say is that pickets should act in a “disciplined and peaceful manner”, even when provoked, and should obey the instructions of union officials at all times.

By the end of the third week, a shabby deal was being patched together, involving seedy union hacks and slippery labour politicians at the highest levels. Even Neil Pillock himself was involved, but the talks (between the ISTC and T&G over coal quotas) were initiated by the MP for Motherwell, whose constituency includes Ravenscraig (Labour Needs those scab votes!).

At the end of it all, the British Steel Corporation gave away nothing over the employment of non-dock labour, and the T&G agreed to meet the BSC/ISTC quota within two months.

Another ‘great victory’.

ORIGINS OF THE DOCK LABOUR SCHEME, AND RECENT DOCK STRUGGLES

From the earliest origins of dock employment until WW2 (in Britain at any rate), employers hired labour on an almost entirely unregulated basis. That is, men would present themselves at some recognised hiring point, usually the dock-gate, and foremen would call on as many as were needed for the day’s business.

Men would be kept to the end of each loading or unloading operation and then paid off according to houses worked or tons moved. Not surprisingly, this system often led to chronic poverty. Figures given to the 1908 Royal Commission on the Poor Law showed that “pauperism” was three times higher among dock labourers than the national average. After WW1, when dockers were covered by national employment benefit, the industry drew three and a half times as much out of the fund as it put in, although this was partly the result of the fact that dockers were one of the first sections of the working class to systematically exploit loopholes in the social security system. Many labourers worked “three days on the hook, three days on the book”.

With the onset of WW2, the need arose for a stable and permanent dock labour force to ensure war production. The first step was to introduce compulsory registration for dockers and to require them to accept transfers between ports (from the ports on the East coast to the now crucially important ports on the West coast of Britain.) This register was started at a time when the only other groups covered by registration were professionals such as scientists and engineers. This was not the first time registers, which had the effect of increasing work discipline and reinforcing the division between dockers and other semi-employed proletarians, had been introduced. But it was the first time they had been successfully introduced on a large scale — previously dockers had resisted them. In 1912 at Birkenhead, Merseyside, the register drawn up by the main union and port employers was only imposed after a long and bitter strike was broken by scabs brought in by the union.

This time, the registration package was unusual in that employers had to register as well. Later, a national corporation was established and ports administration was overseen by local boards, on which sat equal numbers of union and employer representatives.

Despite around 30 strikes in each war year, and rising absenteeism as the war progressed, union representatives proved very valuable to the government and the bosses, by enabling them to abolish a large number of 'restrictive practices'. It was generally felt in government circles that there could be no return to the laissez-faire chaos of the pre-war years. Despite resistance from the employers, the scheme was properly institutionalised in 1947. Casual labour was to stay, but it was sufficiently well-regulated to provide dock labour when and where British capital required it.

BERTH OF A NATION

The National Dock Labour Scheme (NDLS) was, not surprisingly, hailed by many leftists and trade unionists as extremely progressive because it was a form of "workers' control". The General Secretary of the Transport & General Workers' Union described it as a "brave experiment". The implication of this point of view being that through belonging to a strong union, the dockers had been given a 'say' in 'their' industry.

This is totally misleading. The 'dual control' aspect of the scheme was more an attempt to shore-up a rather weak trade union set-up, so that the industry could be reorganised without too much bother from the workers. Ultimately, the scheme paved the way for containerisation in the 1960s.

The historical weakness of the unions in the docks was the result of two causes; the inherent difficulty of maintaining any sort of representative body composed of casual labourers, and the informal rank-and-file strength exercised by the dockers. Two important consequences of this were the always-high level of unofficial strikes (after WW2 the T&G didn't make any strike official until 1961, despite over a dozen major stoppages taking place), and the inability of the unions to police productivity deals. This second aspect is something which has existed throughout the history of unionism in the docks. In 1892, Tom Mann, the president of the Dock, Wharf, Riverside and General Labourers Union, had suggested to a Royal Commission that minimum time rates be abolished, after his membership had persistently ignored his appeals to work harder. More recently, in 1967, when casual work was abolished, it was decided that an agreement based on the one reached with Dockers on the West Coast of the USA must be ruled out because British unions did not have sufficient control over their rank-and-file to deliver the goods promised at the negotiating table.

Another important result was the phenomenon of break-away trade unionism. The most important example of this was the 1920 decision by stevedores to stay out of the T&G-initiated federation. This led to the formation of the National Association of Stevedores and Dockers, which remained in existence as a minority union until the mid-70s. To a certain extent, it competed with the unofficial movement as a focus for workers' discontent with the T&G.

In 1960, the chairman of the London Ship-owners Dock Labour Committee, summed-up the situation as it then was for dock employers:

"In the docks, there is a sense of frustration ... in short we have lost the initiative; it rests not with us, not with the union, but with the men and the agitator."

Indeed, in the mid-60s one third of Liverpool dockers were not in unions at all despite the high level of union control over hiring.

Decasualisation in 1967 was not brought in out of some humanitarian concern for the dockers' well-being, although middle-class liberals had always expressed concern about casual labourers. Victorian philanthropists had been dismayed by the 'demoralisation', 'criminality' and 'vice' associated with this form of employment in the docks. This can be seen as a moral precedent for present-day 'Right to Work' campaigns which always carry the implication that today's casual labourers, those who are working on the black while signing on, should be found 'proper jobs'.

Its function was to break the dockers' control over the production process by ending the host of informal restrictive practices associated with casual hiring, and pave the way for the introduction of containerisation, which would lead to tens of thousands of redundancies. It wasn't just a question of softening up the workers so they would accept job losses. The introduction of containers, which implied a dramatic shift from a work process mostly composed of living labour to one mostly composed of capital, involved a completely new style of management of dock labour. For a start, payment by tonnage had clearly become obsolete, but there was more to it than that. To a large extent, the organisation of labour in the docks, like in C19th factories before the introduction of Taylorism (the exact science of time-and-motion study), remained in the hands of the workers. It was the dockers themselves, organised into work gangs, who passed on their collective expertise from generation to generation, who determined work speeds and methods. It was this 'community of work' which produced much of the intense solidarity found among dockers. However, it must not be romanticised. Amongst dockers there was a rigidly determined hierarchy of job-access and within each gang there was also a definitive hierarchy with a recognised gang-leader. The important point is that all this was largely outside the bosses' control.

Containers are the extension of the production line into transportation. From the factory to the point of sale, the rigidity of the production line — the dream of every capitalist — is maintained, making the worker a mere appendage of the machine, unable to control the process of loading and unloading.

It is no coincidence that the chairman of the National Modernisation Committee (composed of 7 representatives each from bosses and unions), which negotiated decasualisation in the docks, was Lord Brown, the Chairman of Glacier Metal. He was known for his opposition to piece-rates and had switched his own factories to hourly rates in the late '40s and early '50s. This had been an important move by the bosses to establish direct managerial power rather than relying on unpredictable dealings with workers who controlled their own pace of work.

Another benefit for the bosses was that containerisation effectively prevented pilfering, which had always been an important means by which dockers supplemented their wages, usually as a self-regulated 'fringe benefit', occasionally as something more offensive to the employers.

In return for accepting decasualisation, dockers were given 'jobs for life', improvements in pay, pensions and sickness benefits and large redundancy payments to encourage them to leave the industry (at the present time, a registered docker can receive up to £25,000). At the same time, discipline was tightened up - bosses could suspend workers without going through the Dock Labour Board.

WHAT'S UP, DOCK?

It was generally recognised, particularly after 1964 when the Devlin Committee put forward sweeping recommendations about decasualisation, that if it was to be possible at all the leadership of the T&G would have to get its act together pretty quickly.

In London union officials were encouraged to hold dock-gate meetings like the unofficial 'liaison committees' did (many of these committees showed outright hostility to decasualisation). They were even promised loud-speaker equipment to compete with that of the committees.

Throughout the country there were attempts to integrate the shop stewards more closely into the union hierarchy. For example, by giving them administrative tasks at branch level. At the same time, the T&G lifted the ban on CP-ers and Trots holding union office. No doubt the T&G leadership knew very well that even though some of these ideologues of trade unionism were involved in the unofficial movement, they would be only too pleased to smash it in the interests of 'rebuilding the T&G at rank-and-file level'.

With the hurdle of decasualisation got over, the serious business of shedding jobs could begin. Within the first 5 years ('67-'72) the number of dockers declined from around 60,000 to around 40,000.

In April 1972 Liverpool dockers stopped work, refusing to handle containers packed by non-dock labour, and London dockers came out in sympathy. A few weeks later, in July, there was a wildcat strike in Liverpool over the same question.

In response, the bosses and union leaders set up a joint management/union commission to 'look into' the redeployment of surplus dockers. This was known as the Jones-Allington Commission after Jack Jones (General Secretary of the T&G) and Lord Allington (Managing Director of the Port of London). Before the commission had even sat, the dockers were out again, this time they occupied the container depots.

When Liverpool dockers picketed a container-handling firm Industrial Relations Legislation was used to force the union to call off the picketing and its assets were threatened with sequestration if a £5000 fine for contempt was not paid. Even though the union ordered the dockers to stop picketing and agreed to pay the fine (as Jack Jones said afterwards: "No one in our union ever advocated an illegal operation"), the picketing continued unofficially.

Later, on July 21st, the government used the IR Legislation to arrest 5 shop stewards (the 'Pentonville 5'). A wildcat general strike rapidly developed, beginning with the lorry drivers and containermen (many of whom had previously tried to cross dockers' picket lines) and later spread to print, building, engineering, coalmining, the airports, buses and many other industries. At the same time a growing crowd threatened to storm Pentonville prison. There was even some international solidarity with British ships being blacked in Belgium, France and the USA.

The dockers were freed and the dock strike continued. The T&G was forced to back delegates from all over the country who called for a total stoppage because all dockers were facing the same problems. The strike ended with a compromise reluctantly accepted by the dockers, which was only marginally better than that proposed by the Jones-Allington 'recommendation'.

This 'recommendation' — in no way legally binding upon the employers — was mostly concerned with the Temporary Unattached Register, which was supposed to be a register dockers could sign on to if they wanted to be reallocated to a new job. While on the register, they received less than half pay. With the extension of containerisation, the TUR became more and more a dumping-ground for 'surplus' dockers. Before the 1972 agreement there had been almost 6700 on the register. By the end of 1972 this figure had fallen to no more than 1700, and following an agreement in 1974 it was decided not to use the TUR at all except as a disciplinary measure.

Since the early '70s, the dockers have become increasingly reluctant to accept voluntary redundancy as unemployment has risen (particularly in Liverpool.) At the same time, the volume of trade has fallen dramatically, giving rise to a situation where employers have to go on shelling-out for dockers wages even where there is very little work for them to do. In August 1980 there were around 650 dockers being paid to do nothing at all in Liverpool alone. Not surprisingly, the pressure has been on to get rid of, or at least drastically modify, the Dock Labour Scheme.

In September 1980 the Liverpool Port Authorities proposed that 178 dockers belonging to two companies in financial difficulties be signed onto the TUR. As a result dockers in Liverpool, Southampton, Hull and Glasgaw threatened to strike. Before the strike was due to begin, a deal was stitched-up whereby redundancy payments would be increased, 'idle' dockers kept on and retirement at 60 introduced, the money coming from the government which was desperate to avoid a strike. Despite all their monetarist huff and puff, the Tories clearly did not feel that the balance of class forces was in their favour at the time. In return for these concessions the union promised to do everything in its power to encourage its members to take up voluntary redundancy.

Since then the attacks on the dockers "right to idleness" have been stepped-up and national dock strikes have been threatened in '81,'82 and '83.

A major weapon in the hands of the government and employers over recent years has been the development of ports not included in the Dock Labour Scheme because of their unimportance in 1947, which has enabled them to foster the division between Scheme and Non-Scheme dockers.

The situation in the non-Scheme ports is that the dockers can earn more money than in the Scheme ports but have to work much harder, for example being expected to "turn round" ships in about half the time. Naturally this has made these ports more attractive to shipping companies resulting in a large diversion of work away from the Scheme ports. For example, as a result of the latest strike an important contract with the American shipping company, US Lines, was taken away from Southampton and given to Felixstowe.

Felixstowe is at present the largest container port in the country [in terms of value of trade it ranks second only to Dover, the largest passenger port, also non-Scheme] and is something of a show port for the bosses - it's probably no coincidence that there's a police station right opposite the main gate. Recently a deal was fixed up with the local T&G giving Felixstowe dockers similar sick pay and redundancy payments to those on offer in the DLS, thus removing much of the incentive for dockers to join the Scheme. It was finalised between the two recent dock strikes.

Of course, none of this makes it inevitable that non-Scheme dockers become hardened scabs. If the Scheme ports are "pacified" there's every possibility that work will be moved back to the scheme ports putting the jobs of non-Scheme dockers at risk. Whether this minimal basis for unity amounts to much, as the government moves in for the kill following the disastrous defeat of the dockers in August, remains to be seen.

This account simply deals with the situation in the British Docks. For a fuller account of dockers struggles internationally we recommend reading "International Dockers Struggles in the Eighties" produced by B.M.BLOB, LONDON WC1N3XX, currently selling for £1, which we found very helpful in researching our article.

I detect some ignorance surrounding the situation of the Palestinians, and, wishing to polemicise the stance taken by those comrades who slander their struggle for liberation, this being based apparently, on the grounds that all national liberation struggles are inherently bourgeois or reactionary in nature. While not wishing to wholly deny that this is often the case, or to appear uncritical of the PLO, it should be noted that the Palestinian movement to date has been one of the most international in character, and that it seems a gross if not callous mistake to dismiss as unsocialist the struggle of the whole of the Palestinian masses, and not to credit them with any real revolutionary potential. The basis of any international working class movement must be an understanding of all oppressed people, undertaken with a view to the class character of the facts of their existence. The following is an attempt to provide this, and to illustrate with examples, the conditions that they are forced to operate under, and why as a consequence, their resistance has taken the form of armed struggle.

Palestinian unions first emerged in 1925 and, assisted by Zionist land seizures, grew to a membership of 50,000 by 1946. Action against land seizures was however taken, and in 1936 there was a 6-month general strike against the British mandate and the policy of land acquisition. In this strike the Palestinians claim to have lost a greater percentage of the population than the Vietnamese in the Vietnam war. The majority of workers in this period were nevertheless agricultural workers, and until 1948 and the scattering of the Palestinians, 80% still worked on the land.

The disruption of events after 1948 made organising in trade unions difficult, and it was not until 1965 that they fully reorganised as the Palestinian Trades Union Federation (PTUF). Despite being banned in Israel and Jordan, the PTUF still exists and has 31 syndicates which, alongside other unions and syndicates including women's organisations constitute 25% of the Palestinian National Council, the supreme representative body. Many of the unions and syndicates are forced to work underground because they belong to the PTUF and Israeli law forbids trade union or political organisations which express national aspirations.

After 1966, Palestinians were allowed to join the Israeli 'trade union', the Histadrut, although under the auspices of the 'Arab Department'. Most Palestinian members were in unskilled jobs, some working for the Histadrut, one of Israel's largest employers, involved in, for example, constructing Jewish settlements. The 'Arab' Department has however now closed, and the remaining members exist in limbo. Despite all this, the International Labour Organisation still chooses to recognise the Histadrut as a trade union, as does the TGWU in Britain, who recently, in the wake of the Shattila massacres, played host to some touring Histadrut reps.

With the dispersion of the Palestinian masses in 1948, it was the middle classes who came to constitute the diaspora, the nation in exile, and the situation today tends to remain the same. Work in Israel is mostly unskilled, and there's little skilled work in the 'occupied territories' of the West Bank and Gaza. Skilled workers, therefore, tend to emigrate, and, although being Palestinian, they are politically undesirable, the unskilled shall be doubtlessly more so.

Such workers therefore remain employed in the areas of Israeli economy, such as construction or public services and sanitation, where health and safety standards are deficient or difficult to enforce. For these workers there is little hope of solidarity with Sephardic (Arab or Oriental) Jews who occupy the next rung on the ladder of Israeli society. With the '70s influx of Palestinians to Israel and the collapse of attempts such as the bi-racial Black Panthers, Sephardic Jews began to regard the Palestinians as a threat to their own marginal position and have become one of the biggest supports of the right wing Likud Party. The position now is such that the secretary of the (Israeli) construction workers union last year recommended that workers councils and committees should visit sites to prevent employers exploiting the crisis in the construction sector by dismissing Israeli workers and employing others 'at lower salaries and conditions'. (Ha Retz, November 1983). The International Labour Organisation figures show that Palestinians are paid half the wage of an Israeli for the same job.

As men have increasingly become wage slaves, usually working away from their villages, so women have adapted their role in farming or, where no plot exists, they labour in Jewish settlements or work in textiles. Where they are organised in industry, they have fought campaigns for equal pay and rights and sick pay, but there have also been women's demonstrations to protest about the resettling of refugee camps and to express solidarity with striking women prisoners. They have also coordinated work on cases of women under town arrest which interestingly enough was done in association with an Israeli non-Zionist women's group.

THE 'OCCUPIED TERRITORIES'

In Israel, Palestinian villages are largely dormitories, in the West Bank and Gaza the situation is worse. Of four million non-diaspora Palestinians, one million exist here in refugee camps. One third of the work force here are migrants to Israel, not legally permitted to remain overnight although some do, to save fares and travelling time. These workers constitute 5% of the Israeli workforce but 25% of those in construction. In order to work like this they must obtain permits. These are granted for one month initially and thereafter for three months although for the majority of such workers employment is on a daily basis through agencies. Other migrant workers, mostly in construction, are illegal 'casuals' not paying tax or national insurance for which no benefits accrue anyway and which only go to fund directly, the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza.

Within these occupied territories unions are harrassed on the grounds that they are 'hostile to occupation' and workers here again are denied the alternative of belonging to the Histadrut. Under these conditions, and with unemployment at 80% in sectors such as tailor shops, workers are reluctant to strike against Palestinian employers although this has happened.

Indeed, the position of those not selling their labour is such that even a bourgeois policy of reflation could not alleviate the situation. Local industry is hindered through military laws and discriminating taxes and stores now suffer daily raids by the tax authorities. These restrictions also extend to agriculture and farmers need permits for the size and type of their crops and are prohibited from growing crops which are originally Israeli produce such as Jaffa oranges which were originally Palestinian produce. Jordan also restricts West Bank exports on a similar basis.

The situation is again exacerbated by the fact that acquisition still occurs and in the West Bank land expropriation and military zones amount to a third of the area. Where settlements then occur crop output is further affected by their drainage or well sinking lowering the water table or simply by water being diverted. The result of existence under these unremitting conditions is that the inhabitants of West Bank and Gaza have become increasingly dependent on the ability of the migrant workers to sell their labour under the tenuous and exacting circumstances of the Israeli labour market.

It seems obvious therefore, that while a homeland and the very means of existence are denied them on the basis of their nationality, the struggle for Palestinians as workers cannot be separated from the political struggle for national liberation. Indeed for as long as they are expelled from their homeland while being prohibited access to other countries or means of existence the prospect of armed struggle will remain, and one which could as easily exist under the banners of anti-racism and anti-imperialism as that of statism. They should not therefore be denied a homeland, not at least by anyone unwilling to burn their own prestigious little passport or national identity card, and, while remaining critical of stais tendances we should support their emancipation and attempt to engender a culture of anarchism within the Arab world amongst whose history to date it remains little known.
TURNING A BLIND EYE IN GAZA?
Workers' Playtime replies ...

In our 'prestigious little passports', it clearly says they are the property of HM Government. It follows that to burn them would be a first irreversible step in the generalised refusal of the identities capitalism forces upon us, and of the power of the capitalist state, etc. etc. etc. But as we cross the line into illegalism, we become unavoidably committed to armed struggle against the existing capitalist nation states, in the name of those yet unborn generations? (of capitalist nation states.)

But we should seriously consider the effect mass passport-burning would have on the employment prospects of millions of migrant workers from places like Sicily, Spain, Scotland and Yugoslavia who make up the manual working class in Switzerland, and a large part of it in West Germany. True, without any travel documents these people would be saved the indignities of having their passports imounded by an 'alien' police to stop them skipping the country before the end of their employment contract, being harassed, exploited and watched, knowing they are propping up an 'alien' economy for the sake of a wage which won't buy anything in the country where it's earned, even if it will support a family or maybe two back home.

But of course, these people aren't stateless. They already have the right to a 'homeland', to democratically self-determine their lives. They won these privileges through their 'supreme representative bodies', of course, and by working in their trade union organisations. Didn't they.

The cause of the Palestinians' vulnerability to exploitation and unemployment isn't their statelessness, but their status as a distinct and visible underclass in Israel and Israeli-occupied territories. Zionism hasn't just disenfranchised Palestinians. It has actually created the Palestinian working class, by turning a population of small farmers into a pool of underemployed wage-labour in the space of forty years. The creation of Israel was the creation of a modern capitalist state. It began in the 1930s, when Zionist settlers began systematically buying-out rich Palestinian and Turkish landowners (many of whom lived far enough away not to care less about the erosion of their 'homeland'), and the political transformation of Palestine into the new state of Israel was sanctioned by the United Nations in 1948. Accelerated economic growth meant the expropriation of the Palestinian peasantry, a process which is still going on in the occupied territories. That's what's meant by 'making the desert bloom': Palestinians were faced with a choice: either they stayed and worked for the new landlord, or they went into exile. This 'progress' was sustained by the unifying force of Zionism, which set the seal on a pact of collaboration between all classes of Israeli citizens. Underwritten by the military and economic sponsorship of the U.S. bloc, Israeli nationalism meant the near-genocide of the Palestinian Arab peasantry and the bedouin tribes.

This is the background to the present struggles of Palestinian workers. The point is that Zionism would have remained a popular lost cause to this day, regardless of the suffering of European Jews in the 1930s and '40s, if the 'allied' powers had not found a use for it in its plan for constructing the post-war capitalist world. This plan transformed the sentimental dream of a Jewish homeland into the vicious reality of triumphant Zionism. As the Israeli parliament's first fascist MP said, after his recent election to the Knesset, "I prefer an Israel everyone hates to an Auschwitz the whole world loves." And unless the politicians find a similar use for Palestinian nationalism, the hopes of diaspora Palestinians to return from exile will not be realised, except with the end of capitalism and all states.

Despite nationalist rhetoric, the homeland which the EVIL NATIONALIST VIOLENCE: The King David Hotel, Jerusalem, bombed by Irgun (Zionist) terrorists on July 22nd, 1946

Palestinians lost can never be reconstructed — any more than modern Israel is a reconstruction of biblical Judea. In any case, it is hard to imagine educated Palestinians, living in the cities of Saudi Arabia or Kuwait, wanting to return to some rented small-holding owned by an absentee landlord (even if he was a Palestinian). Israel has obliterated the homelands of the 1930s. In their place it has established new townships, agricultural settlements and militarised zones. The Arab villages are still there, but — even in the West Bank — they have rapidly become workers' dormitories, serving the new industrial centres...

So, what 'solutions' does Palestinian nationalism propose? Either an 'autonomous' mini-territory on the West Bank of the River Jordan; the re-partition of the former Mandate Territory into separate Jewish and Arab states; or the abolition of the state of Israel and its replacement by a secular republic. Since the 'integrity' of the present state of Israel is guaranteed by the United States and its western allies, the only 'realistic' prospect is the first one — the one which is currently being sponsored by the 'moderate' Arab states, the one which might be acceptable to the pro-Arafat wing of the PLO (and the one which was being diplomatically touted by Geoffrey 'Mogadon' Howe, the British Foreign Secretary, during his recent excursion to the region.) But any West Bank statelet would be economically and militarily dependent on its sponsors, including Israel. Whether it could be sold to the 4 million Palestinians would have to be seen. Of course, there's always an outside chance the next US elections will produce a pro-Palestinian communist government. Or that Syria will single-handedly crush Israel and all her allies, then hand it over to the PLO on a plate ...

Nationalism, in all its more-or-less subtle variations, has only one function; to divide the working class — to organise it, stifle it, to turn workers into cannon-fodder for the endless inter-ruling class struggles taking place around the world. It's the same whether we are talking about the second-division nationalism of the PLO, IRA and ANC (nationalism under the banner of 'liberation', meaning the establishment at some point in the future of a state which as yet exists only in blueprint); the victorious, consolidating, 'progressive' nationalism of the MPLA in Angola or the FNLA in Nicaragua; or the 'reactionary' nationalism of Israel's Likud party or the Loyalists in Ulster. What makes racist ideologies like Zionism and Loyalty so much more obnoxious than Irish Republicanism and Palestinian nationalism is the fact that they defend and strengthen the practice of existing national ruling classes. But the core of all nationalist ideologies is the same; and its function is always the same: to mobilise the working class in defiance of the interests of its political masters, whether they are in or out of power. Zionism itself shows how the nationalism of the 'underdog' can become the nationalism of the 'master race' in the blink of an eye.

Leftism embraces nationalist ideology when it appears to coincide with its own ambitions of power. When the losers start to get the upper hand, 'contradictions' may appear. For instance in Zimbabwe, Robert Mugabe's ZANU-PF party decided to guarantee the gains of its victory in the civil war by declaring a one-party state and massacring the tribal opposition in the south-west of the country. The British Left, however, continues to support the regime — although over a period of time it has become less fulsome in its adulation of 'Comrade Mugabe', and in private some leftists mutter hopefully about 'growing pains' and 'third world consciousness'. So much for International Socialism.

To us the meaning of Nationalism — the Religion of the Twentieth Century — should be clear; whatever its guise, Nationalism means patriotic death. It means the suffocation of class struggle and the postponement of revolution — the only hope the working class has of putting an end to the misery of capitalism, which colonises all our lives wherever we see. The working class must take back, not just its squalid ghettos and miserable patches of desert, but the whole world. The working class has no country, no homeland to return to, as long as every territory and every area of its life is carved up into spheres of capitalist interest. Nothing less than world revolution will alter that condition.

If the consequences for the working class of recently successful left-nationalist campaigns is not enough to convince you that National Liberation ideology, far from being an 'inseparable' part of revolutionary struggle in some parts of the world, lies in fact — in each and every instance — proved to be a deadly mystification, then a look at the present role of social-nationalist organisations will probably not be enough to end the argument. But it's worth a try.

Inevitably, the leaders and cadres of these organisations behave as a proto-ruling class the minute they manage to 'liberate' a piece of territory from the yoke of the imperialist oppressor. In the early 1970s, for instance, the IRA's enthusiastic policing of the 'no-go' areas it established in the Bogside and other communities gave some Catholics in the six counties of Northern Ireland a taste of full-blooded Republican rule. But over much larger areas, and long after the pockets of IRA hegemony were overrun by British military force, the republican godfathers have maintained themselves as a second government. In the Catholic estates, the IRA continues to operate as a paramilitary police force in competition with the RUC, proving itself to be a capable defender of private property and public morals by its summary methods of dealing with wayward youths, vandals and petty criminals. It has alternately orchestrated and suppressed collective demonstrations of resistance, according to the current turn of its own electoral and military strategy. In the economy, it uses and profits from a large number of enterprises, both 'legitimate' and black market. The IRA and loyalist organisations have carved out distinct areas of jurisdiction over employment in many industries: in the Belfast construction trades, the lines are so well-established that the rival paramilitaries regularly arrange mutual guarantees of safe-conduct for workers engaged on sites located in 'enemy territory'.

In the case of the PLO, it is not a case of 'criticising statist tendencies'. The PLO is a state without a territory, with an institutional sophistication comparable with any other small state, complete with democratic constitution, parliament, government and (until recently, loyal) opposition, treasury, army and welfare bureaucracy. It sees Palestinians in friendly Arab countries, enforces contributions elsewhere, and generally behaves like any other state in the areas where it holds sway. Its own propaganda boasts as much.

In his endless search for political sponsors, Yasser Arafat — still nominal leader of the PLO — has proved himself a back-stabbing politician of international stature, hobnobbing with well-known proletarian leaders around the world, notably the Saad royal family and King Husseim of Jordan, author of the 1970 Black September massacre of Palestinian refugees in the West Bank, which was then under Jordanian rule. Arafat's opponents in the PLO (in case you prefer them), are financed and armed by another notable upholder of workers' rights, Syria's Hafez al Assad, the Butcher of Hama (in April 1981, 10,000 opponents of the Ba'athist regime were slaughtered in the suppression of widespread revolts.)

Although he begins by promising to make a case for the PLO's armed wing, M. Diane does not mention the subject again until his closing remark that "the prospect of armed struggle will remain" as long as the Palestinians are "denied a homeland". In other words, 'professional' violence can be justified if it has nationalistic aims. This implies that more general class resistance is impossible until the creation of a nation state (on racial lines) has opened up the possibility of violent struggle by 'its' working class.

The fact is that even today, by monopolising and institutionalising the fight against the Zionist state, the PLO is actively reinforcing the sense of helplessness felt by Palestinians living in the Occupied Territories. To those living under totalitarian terror, it offers liberation by proxy.

Against any notion of the 'armed party', as the armed wing of the working class, we argue the need to generalise violent resistance in terms of who does it and what it is for. The problems are very different, but for the Palestinians as for proletarians everywhere including us, the need is to kick inside the division between 'amateur' noters on the one hand and 'professional' armed factions on the other. This is the only way the working class can take back the initiative from the military and political vanguards, whatever radical colours they goosestep under.

Trade unionists bear the same relation to the struggles of Palestinian workers as it does anywhere else, although from M. Diane's account you would think they were the same thing. The Palestinian Trade Union Federation does not pretend to be even formally autonomous from the Palestinian state-in-exile. Its role is the role of all trade unions — to negotiate the rate and terms of exploitation, to discourage militancy where it conflicts with 'broader considerations', to harness class struggle to the pursuit of the national(s) interest. In the words of the Middle East Research and Action Group, "Workers employed on the West Bank have on the whole been reluctant to go on strike over pay and conditions against local Palestinian employers ... whatever trade union activity does exist is seen primarily as a part of the whole struggle ..."

How can we then say that "the struggle for Palestinians as workers cannot be separated from the struggle for national liberation", and claim at the same time that we are trying to understand the fight of "all oppressed people with a view to the class character of the facts of their existence"?

Any attempt to relate revolutionary activity in western Europe to the struggles of Palestinian workers will run into what appear to be 'theoretical' problems. In spite of the fact that the PLO seems to monopolise the struggles of Palestinian workers, we cannot accept that this struggle is inseparable from nationalist aspirations. But to say this means we are condemning Palestinians, and denying that Palestinian workers have any "revolutionary potential" is ridiculous. It is like saying that we condemn the miners in Britain for belonging to nationalist and counter-revolutionary organisations like the NUM and the Labour Party.

It's no use pretending that the working class doesn't really have anything to do with nationalism, reformism, the PLO, the Labour Party, or whatever — as if these things were simply imposed on our struggles, and grudgingly gone along with. We are not some breed of happy apes, naturally resistant to all forms of authority, ideology and self-defeating practice.

But that's no excuse for throwing up your hands in dismay and swallowing leftist propaganda wholesale. What's the use of trying to "engender a culture of anarchism in the arab world", if we ourselves forget anarchism's basic insights : that the representatives of the working class are its worst enemies; and that the working class has no homeland, and never will, until the day it overthrows all states and tears down every frontier?
NICARAGUA has been in the news recently, with the elections (the first in that part of the world for fifty years) and some very unsubtle attempts by the US Government to reap the benefits of an invasion without actually having to carry one out. This was met by some very unsubtle attempts by the Nicaraguan Government to reap the benefits of a threatened invasion without having to suffer one, in the form of a massive patriotic mobilisation.

'Socialism' in Quotation Marks

EVERYONE wants to be a winner. Political people are no different. The official movement in this country seems stuck in the swamps of social democracy, where it has been since the turn of the century. The preachings of Norman Thomas, Socialist Party candidate of the '30's and '40's, were little different than the ramblings of today's publications such as In These Times or Socialist Review. As usual, the left looks outside the US for action.

In 1979, just as the two-bar blues of the punk scene began to seem stale — a Revolution! Nicaragua was the place. Augusto Cesar Sandino, a martyred leader, a cross between Davy Crockett and Robin Hood, was a perfect candidate for vicarious hero worship.

From its very inception in the early 1960's the Sandinista National Liberation Front has emphasized multi-class cooperation against the regime, and that the patriotic middle classes would play a central role in any effort to topple Somoza. From the time of La Prensa Publisher Pedro Joachim Chamorro's assassination in early 1978 until Somoza's defeat in July 1979 the F.S.L.N. leadership was maneuvering to place itself in a government of 'National Unity' with people like the 'group of twelve', (Los Doce), and other representatives of the 'progressive liberal' upper middle classes. The final overthrow of Somoza was to a great degree an unorganized and spontaneous revolt in which working class and poor did most of the fighting and dying. But there was no time when the workers and peasants asserted their interests separately from the middle-class struggle against the old dictatorship. The Sandinista regime quickly straited its class nature by inviting leading businessmen Alfonso Robles and Arturo Cruz into the ruling junta.

At a Managua labor seminar of the State-controlled labor union, the 'Sandinista Worker's Central' (CST), Commander Carlos Yomo declared that it was inadvisable to distinguish between those members of the bourgeoisie who are still influenced by imperialism and those who had been over the lands the campesinos would grow food for themselves instead of growing export crops for the State. The Sandinistas said that the peasants were not informed enough to make responsible decisions about their own lives. Against the actions of the landless peasants the FSLN bureaucrat Tomas Borge spoke for the regime, saying that 'private property would be respected' and 'the Revolution will act with a strong and firm hand, because it cannot allow counter-revolution as the name of revolution.' [3] One Chilean leftist commented: 'I don't understand at all, one minute seizing the land is revolutionary, then they tell you it's counter-revolutionary.' [4] Under the rule of the FSLN the only lands that have been 'expropriated' are the ranches, farms, and factories belonging to Somoza and his cronies, about 50 per cent of the productive resources of the country. Out of this figure, three-fourths have been 'People's Property,' i.e., state-operated farms, and 1/4 have become cooperatives, where several small farmers pool their resources and labor under the production plans of the State. [5]

The majority of the farms controlled and from the Somocista large, modern, commercial-oriented export farms were taken over and worked by a small peasant wage labor force supplemented by a large seasonal labor force. The importance of these farms within the national economy was key in the decision to carry out the state farms (6) by promoting by INRA (Nicaraguan Institute of Agrarian Reform) with worker participation, (meaning co-determination) rather than to privatize the commune model of the war period.

In the recent regime all over the world the Sandinista empowerment of 'socialism' is strictly a use of legal jurisdiction based on who owns and manages the productive resources rather than on the real relations of people to one another and to the things they produce. What was under Somoza a separate economy of the Somocista large, profit-oriented enterprise producing goods and services for the accumulations of capitalization exchange with local and international markets, not for the free and direct use of the producers themselves. This same capitalist economy under Sandinista control is referred to as the 'People's Sector' by the Sandinista government and its supporters.

In early 1980, employees went on strike against the construction industry, the largest sugar mill in Nicaragua, and 15 workers including FABRITEX, the largest textile mill in the country. Many were affiliated with the Confederation for Union Act and Unity (CAUS), a union associated with the pro-Moscow Nicaraguan ‘Communist’ Party. The response of the supposedly revolutionary regime was swift and severe. Representatives of CAUS and PCN were imprisoned for several months. Dissident leftists were jailed, and the state-run press organized a mob to besmear the offices of CAUS, accusing it of links to the CIA. Now, almost any criticism of the FSLN is labelled ‘CIA inspired’. The wave of strikes was broken.

For a year after their release in May, 1980, the war of nerves continued between the in-power bureaucrats of the FSLN and the out-of-power bureaucrats of CAUS and PCN. But in September, 1981, a series of emergency decrees were issued by the ruling junta including a ban on strikes. One month later, the CAUS issued a statement attacking the ban, and calling the leadership for encouraging foreign investment. The Sandinistas responded by arresting 100 members of CAUS and PCN. Twenty-seven union members were given one-year jail sentences for distributing a leaflet critical of the junta. On November 1, the Ministry of Labor closed the FABRITEX plant and disassembled the factory, accusing the unions of boycotting production and ‘negative activities’ and of ‘politically interfering’ the FABRITEX workers. Taking a page out of the strike breaking tactics of private capitalists, the FSLN told the employees of FABRITEX to look for work elsewhere (with unemployment at 15%). The state-controlled press even blamed the worker unrest on ‘anarchists’.

General leftist like Paul Sweezy claim there is no conflict of interest between the Catholic clergy and the Sandinistas. It seems to be an accurate statement. Two bureaucratic political entities, acting to decide what is good for the state and hoping to consolidate their subordinated flock. Instead of ministering in all aspects of other people’s lives, the coalition of priests and commissars express the repressive panoply by persecuting prostitutes and chasing immoral gay bars. Their attempts to end prostitution have resulted only in the persecution of women who work as prostitutes and not in the ending of the material scarcity and sexual repression which are the basis of prostitution. Of course, abortions are banned. In this new order, women die in horrible back alley abortions or risk prosecution for procuring abortions.

George Black, a synecdochic supporter of the FSLN reported: ‘But the most visible change in Nicaragua in the Revolution’s first year is a conscious demilitarization of women, the result of a military regulation minimizing the exposure of women to potential combat situations and by the fact that the female combatants on the streets of Managua are a thing of the past, and the move to reassign women to secretarial, guard and political education duties was resisted by many women who had given proof of their equal male counterparts in battle. Many women, however, have left the EPS (the regular army). When the first officer ranks were created in February 1980, the list contained only fifteen women out of a total of 230.’ [4] Ironically, the state-controlled women’s association AMNIARE insists that women should have the right to be drafted into the Army. [9]

Billboards and posters with jingoistic slogans appear everywhere in Nicaragua, celebrating the virtues of the state and of ‘production for the fatherland.’ Pro-government literature and films are full of references to the glorious leadership of Daniel Ortega and Tomás Borge and of images of the government’s militias goose-stepping amidst cries of ‘Patria o muerte’ (Fatherland or death). Billboards from the Bank of America announce, ‘To companion en la reconstruccion’ [8] The FSLN takes this comradeship seriously. A government pamphlet states

‘The World Bank and the IMF have both noted the new government’s sense of prudence and sound thinking in the area of monetary policy. In the period between July 1979 and July 1981 inflation in Nicaragua reached 86%. By 1980 this figure had been reduced to 20% and in 81 to 24%. Complementing the food subsidies given to the majority of the population with an austere wage policy greatly contributed to achieving this stability in prices’. [10] (emphasis added) On Radio Sandinista demagoguery, the US imperialists have been followed by commercials for Pepsi-Cola.

There are a variety of ‘mass organizations’ that give the illusion of popular power when they are actually one-way transmission belts from the ruling junta downwards to the masses. The country is covered by a network of Cuban styled ‘Sandinista Defense Committees’ (CDS) which act to integrate all citizens into the reconstruction plans of the State and which also serve to spy on anyone suspected of disloyalty to the regime. [11] A CDS order distributed in Managua in September 1981 instructed, ‘You should watch all night over the streetcorner, noting every passing car, its make, color, and number, watch who’s passing by and figure out where he’s going. Post a lookout over the neighbor coming home and see if he arrives with packages or furniture. When you see someone stranger in the neighborhood, watch and follow him to see what he’s doing. We must not let even one movement escape our notice, since these people could be counterrevolutionaries.’

Inter junta Solidarity

The FSLN supported the ultra right regime in Argentina for its anti-imperialist slaughtered in the Falklands Malvinas islands. This nationalistic bias occurred at a time when rising working-class militancy threatened the stability of that regime. The Sandinistas also supported the military suppression of Solidarnosc. Apologists for the FSLN excused this on the grounds that they were receiving most of their aid from the Eastern Bloc. The truth, however, is that over 4/5 of this aid was coming from outside the Eastern bloc. [12] A more convincing explanation might be that the junta was doing the same thing on a smaller scale as Jaruzelski in Poland. In Nicaragua strikes, the basic defensive weapon of the working class, had already been banned, and the so-called ultra left opposition has been crushed.

Frederico Lopez, head of the FSLN propaganda department said: ‘Should it be impossible to neutralize anti-Soviet feelings with respect to Poland, we should strive to neutralize possible analogies between Nicaragua and Poland, above all with respect to strikes.’ (From ‘A Critical Look at the Sandinistas’ by Eric Chester, Changes, May, 1982.)

‘If necessary, we will use force to put an end to seizures and strikes, in order to guarantee national production and the development of the reconstruction plan.’ (Moises Hassan, member of the Sandinista junta, quoted in Cambio 16, March 4, 1980.)

‘Commandantes live in the wealthier districts of Managua, occupying mansions previously owned by leading Somocistas. They are provided with chauffeur-drive cars, servants and bodyguards. Their government offices are air-conditioned, a status symbol in tropical Managua. Of a poor country, this is a very affluent style of life.’ (Eric Chester, ibid.)

Commodity production has not been thrown overboard, but instead is regulated and protected by the state. The Sandinistas are attempting to organize Nicaragua in a military fashion but there are signs of rebellions in different places. Besides illegal strikes, the FSLN’s national mobilization for military service has been widely resisted. The Sandinistas’ efforts to get unemployed workers and university students to volunteer to bring in foreign exchange crops hasn’t been very successful either.

We have to look at the reality, not the rhetoric. The Sandinistas, the FMLN/EDR in El Salvador and all the leftist, peasants, trade unionists and armed groups are the anti-capitalist or anti-imperialist. They only aspire to build a nationally based capitalism which is not completely tied to North America capital, but perhaps more tied to the social-democratic bankers of Sweden and West Germany. The left-capitalists in Central America also wish to avoid the mistakes made by the Cuban regime’s development of an inefficient state capitalism which is totally dependent on the Russian-led East Bloc. One can oppose US intervention in Central America without supporting the leftist nationalists. The current rulers of El Salvador, Honduras, and Guatemala are greedy psychopaths and exploiters and they deserve to end up on front of a firing squad. (They’ll probably end up in Miami.)

Pragmatism and Empiricism

Pragmatic leftists often defend the Sandinistas by posing the question, ‘Well, what else can they do in their situation?’ This seemingly innocuous rebuttal, when examined, reveals how totally inadequate most left analyses are — indeed, how capitalist these analyses are. First and foremost one notices the implicit assumption that the Sandinistas are the revolutionary subject, and not the workers and peasants. The argument that the Sandinistas ‘represent’ the interests of the workers and peasants fails completely, given their ban on strikes and expropriations, and protection of private capital. It also ignores the historical record of comparable revolutions (China, Cuba, Grenada, etc.), and avoids the crucial issue of power relations between classes, within “mass organizations,” and among nation-states.

Behind this lies state worship — the complete acceptance of the nation-state as the ultimate revolutionary subject, and not the workers and peasants. The argument that the Sandinistas ‘represent’ the interests of the workers and peasants fails completely, given their ban on strikes and expropriations, and protection of private capital. It also ignores the historical record of comparable revolutions (China, Cuba, Grenada, etc.), and avoids the crucial issue of power relations between classes, within “mass organizations,” and among nation-states.

A National Socialism

National liberation movements are capitalist multi-class coalitions. Pedestrians of the Third World do the fighting, dying, and working so that small elites of Western (or Russian) educated intellectuals and military officers can take power and force-develop capitalist production. Living standards may improve. Health, nutrition and literacy campaigns fulfill a role in developing market production for productions sake. A healthy, well nourished wage slave can work longer and more efficiently. A literate worker can read technical manuals — and pro-government newspapers. The new capitalist states establish a totalitarian surveillance of the workers, using mass systematic repression to stifle dissent and prevent the defense from fighting back. And when all your poverty and victimization are presented in the guise of ‘socialism’, a false faith in the virtues of ‘democratic’ capitalism tyrannies is reinstalled among oppressed classes everywhere. A threat perhaps ultimately more dangerous than the contras.

The Butchering dictatorships and extreme poverty that pervades the Third World cannot be remedied in any one country, 2 they are the direct product of the capitalist economy, the system of commodity-production, market exchange, wage labor and profit which exists in every nation in the world. Even the most directly democratic and communist regime would fall if it found itself within the capitalist division of national boundaries, because it would lose its critical juxtaposition to the world-wide market system, and its threat would be assuaged on a globally coordinated basis. The state inhumanity of the totalitarian capitalist regimes in Cuba, China, and elsewhere is plain for all to see.

A Real Revolution Is Still Possible

In response to falling living standards and tyrannical regimes, war or the threat of war, working people have a great capacity to link up with one another to reject counter-revolutionary forces, and fight aggressively on a multinational level. As the growing insurrections of the 20th century, workers have gone beyond the parties and unions of the old society, and, again and again, formed organizations like the soviet republics in the Russian Revolution. Workers, peasants and intellectuals have formed grassroots organizations across the whole of society, the state, and from external opposition armed militias of the revolutionary workers. This kind of revolutionary perspective hasn’t developed yet in Central America, and all of the rightists and leftists stand in the way of it.

What has to emerge is a massive and determined movement for libertarian communism. Not just in the poor regions of Central America, but also in the nations of Latin America with large and combative working classes such as Mexico, Argentina, and Brazil, and in the major capitalist nations as well. We must use people by the exchange of things, do away with the basis of all wars and poverty, and begin a new era of liberty and community for the entire human race.

‘It is one of the peculiarities of revolutions that just as the people seem about to break a great spell and all the people suffer themselves to be ruled by the delusions of the past and surrender all the power and influence they have so clearly won into the hands of men who represent, or are supposed to represent, the popular movement of a bourgeoisie.’ Karl Marx, Collected Works.

This article by a Playmate is one persons view of the purpose of producing Playtime. It argues that return to normal production after six months is "not a defeat", that the "greatest battle of all has been the struggle itself", and that the failure of the lay-off to achieve a better result is due to the lack of solidarity from the rest of the class. In short that you should

Doubt every word

When we started Workers Playtime two years ago we agreed about several things. One was that the unpopularity of the idea of revolution today was due, in large part, to the silly, stale and unintelligible attempts to argue for it. Not that we had any instant solutions to this (as you may already be thinking). We didn't start Playtime because we all agreed about everything, but because we discovered we had the resources to produce it. We were more united in being aware of questions than in having answers to them. Two years later things have developed in some respects. Our ability to put Playtime together as a 'package' has grown considerably. Against that there have been some set-backs. We suffered a severe blow last spring in losing our printers and production base. It has taken a long time to recover our ability to print cheaply and conveniently. Reorganising other production facilities has been rather harder (hence part of the delay in producing this issue). But the difficulties this caused us has only accentuated another problem which had been building up over a long time. Our common sense of why were producing Playtime hadn't kept pace with our technical abilities (such as they are). In short productive relations were lagging behind productive forces and the onset of 'crisis' made this all too apparent. Well the last few months have seen efforts by us to move from 'the formal domination' of Playtime to a 'real domination' blah blab etc... The first results of this lie in your hands dear reader.

Confronting our own dissatisfaction and differences of perspective had another consequence. Unhappy with the fact that we weren't doing enough by way of looking for solutions to the problems we all saw, now we became aware that we weren't even conveying very clearly that we saw any problems. This became most obvious when we met people who'd read Playtime but didn't know us. Some had liked the paper but didn't get on with us. Others said they were pleasantly surprised to discover that the image they'd got of us from reading Playtime was quite wrong. Specifically that we weren't as boring and worthy as people first became radicalised. In order to make what follows clear I should say that for us in Playtime the Left, from the Party to the so-called 'revolutionary' left of Trotsky and their 'left shadows', is nothing more than the left wing of capitalism. When we talk of revolutionaries we mean those currents and individuals who see - in however distorted a way - that it's necessary to overthrow capitalism and the alienated social relations of capitalist society. Not just 'reform' or 'restructure' them but destroy them.

In both activist and traditional circles there is a reluctance to confront the reality of this society and the struggle against it. Or to confront the task of putting the case for revolution in terms that are relevant to that reality. Indeed for many militants the retreat back into activism or traditional sectors isn't a search for a better understanding, or for a focus for struggle but a search for an identity - a uniform in which to parade their militancy and conceal their doubts. Fair enough, this is a response to a real problem, the social alienation and isolation which has been the great achievement of 'advanced' capitalism. (And of course social alienation can be seen more clearly and isolation become more acute as individuals set themselves consciously against this society). Nevertheless adopting a 'militant' role sidesteps the fact that the 'identities' on offer the various 'revolutionary traditions' and their defence: Anarchism, Left Communism, Situationism, Councilism etc. On the other hand into forms of 'activism' - a trend which is encouraged by the fact that 'activism' is more attractive than the traditions as people first become radicalised. In this article I'm concentrating on these 'political' currents rather than groups in other areas of struggle, because it is out of these that Playtime has developed. And I've more to say about the 'traditions' than about activism. Activism usually starts from the right idea - that there's a need to struggle but it's lack of any real sense of direction generally leads to disillusionment. Or it stops tailing the Left (whether by Militant attempts to make leftist strategies successful, or by remaining dependent on left demonstrations, meetings etc. in order to display a Militant alternative) and finishes up joining it.

"There are the thoughtless who never doubt.

The first problem that has to be faced is that these are not very receptive times for the ideas of would-be revolutionaries. Many take heart from the developing signs of crisis and breakdown all around. Rather fewer seem prepared to admit that crisis and breakdown are, if anything, more evident in the currents of those looking towards revolution, than in the society they wish to revolutionise. Over the last few years we have seen a marked decline in the revolutionary circles in this country (there have of course been exceptions to this rule). Overall there has been a retreat. On the one hand into
In capitalist society are an aspect of the social relations we’re supposed to be overthrowing. We don’t have the option of ‘personal liberation’ from these alienated ‘identities’ while capitalist social relations remain. Unfortunately we do have the option of believing that our ‘identities’ are ‘natural’ or ‘real’ and not a product of the capital culture we live in. These sorts of belief make understanding society and what’s involved in its overthrow more difficult — however much it does for the self-confidence of the militant holding them.

None of us who produce Playtime would pretend that we haven’t made these sorts of mistakes, or that collectively we can offer some magical solution to these problems. There’s nothing very remarkable about us and we’re certainly not exempt from the difficulties facing all would-be revolutionaries. The most important thing distinguishing us and the groups we feel close to is our attitude to these common problems. We want to confront rather than evade them. We would like to encourage people to maintain a sceptical attitude towards the conventional wisdoms of ‘revolutionary’ orthodoxy, while remaining prepared to think about things for themselves. In the same way we’d like to encourage people to doubt the capitalist lies (from left and right) about this society — while remaining capable of coming to conclusions and acting on them.

For me the point of producing Playtime is to tackle two of the most serious difficulties facing people like us who want to write written arguments for revolution. (Amongst other forms of struggling that is). Firstly, coming to an understanding of the society we live in and of what’s happening. Secondly, attempting to renew the case for revolution in the light of that understanding. To date Playtime’s confrontation with the first of these difficulties has been limited to those aspects of society, and the struggle against it, which those of us who started Playtime were interested in or felt competent to write about. Basically this meant a diet of workplace class struggle and general politics. Unfortunately this corresponds to a number of ‘traditional’ political agenda’s. Hardly surprisingly since most of us are ‘graduates’ or ‘drop-outs’ from such ‘schools of Revolution’. Equally unsurprisingly it has led to Playtime being lumped together with the publications of these traditional sects. Suffice to say here that we see workplace class struggle as a crucial element in the movement towards revolution and we will continue to write about it. However its not the only form of class struggle, nor is that the only area of struggle. We wish — and intend — to write about other aspects of this society and the struggle against them. Still we are well aware of how inadequately grounded our thinking is in these areas we have looked at in the past — we’ve no intention of writing a lot of crap about them even less about simply in order to demonstrate the ‘breadth’ of our conception of revolution.

“‘They don’t believe in the facts, they believe Only in themselves.”

As to “renewing the case for revolution”, Playtime’s hesitancy has been even more marked. Indeed the word paralysis springs to mind. Here it is necessary to make clear what I mean by renewing the case for revolution. Many militants would agree that we are not doing this — but see this as being our ‘failure’ to express our common political positions as a ‘platform’ or ‘aims and principles’, or to give ‘form’ to our thinking by working one out. Our ‘failure’ to do so isn’t some oversight. We don’t see platform touring as very useful (except in political competition with traditional sects — which doesn’t interest us much). Its true that platforms — in the sense of a concise statement of the basic level of common understanding between revolutionaries — do have a limited role. But they are not a way of short-cutting necessary debate. The problem today is that the basic agreement and understanding necessary for debate to take place (that is, understanding and agreement about terminology — what to call about non about conclusions), doesn’t exist in an active, living form between revolutionaries. At best platforms are a limited expression of the depth of debate between those people who believe that the only solution to the horrors of this society lies in its overthrow — in revolution. In times like today when what debate exists is characterised by lack of depth, what function do platforms have?

They become a substitute for debate as militants continue writing ‘traditional’ theoretical machinery — incorporating the ‘dead labour’ of past generations of revolutionaries. (And not always the distant past. ‘Situationism’ for example, or the ‘Left Communism’ that developed in the early Seventies from the ‘bolshevizing’ of various cancanists, luxumurgerist or ‘rev. socialist’ fragments.) Where not actually clapped out this machinery produces as much low quality rubbish as it does usable insights into this society and the struggle against it. And sorting out the gold from the dross is frequently more effort than it’s worth. Worse still however, it is used as a shortcut to understanding society rather than as a set of ideas to be tested against experience in struggles. In becoming a way of evading the problems that reality faces would be revolutionaries with.

“When it comes to the point the facts must go by the board.”

Renewing the case for revolution today means re-establishing an active debate about this society and the need for its overthrow. Obviously that will be done in reference to what has been done in the past (how else?). But it will not substitute past theorising for present activity.

Some revolutionaries are aware of this but argue that we can’t afford the ‘luxury’ of abstract debate. Today, they argue, there aren’t enough of us — the need is for ‘basic propaganda’ to ‘win’ people to revolutionary ‘positions’. When we have the ‘numbers’ we can sustain a debate. This tends to presuppose that ‘we’ (however defined) will be doing the debating, and doing so in order to improve our presentation to ‘The Class’ who somehow exist ‘out there’. But even ignoring this aspect I believe it stands things on their head. Part of the reason there are so few of ‘us’ is because the so-called ‘basic propaganda’ is so badly done. And this theory which should assist in producing it largely lacks substance. In contrast to the left, who try to conceal a ‘hidden agenda’ of counter-revolutionary aims behind their words, most ‘revolutionary’ propaganda is incoherent in its own terms and hides no agenda at all. Instead it brandishes a tired collection of catchphrases and proverbs.
from safely behind the battlements of one of the traditions.

"Their patience with themselves is boundless.

I'm not suggesting that the traditions are all alike, or equally useless - some are much worse than others, and traditional groups all adopt different (mistaken) strategies for dealing with the same (real) problems. For some traditionalists the job of working out ideas - 'developing theory' - becomes a matter of achieving political consistency within one of the traditions. Becoming the 'real' anarchism, or left communism etc etc. This sort of 'consistency' is always based on turning one or two 'fundamental' ideas into eternal truths, existing outside of history or struggle. It's either 'developed' at the expense of any revolutionary spirit, or of contact with reality.

For other militants 'developing theory' means creating a 'new' tradition. Normally this means spicing up leftist or liberal 'common-sense' with some borrowings from revolutionary debate, and a lot of intellectual elitism. (As can be seen in some forms of 'Autonomism' and 'Situationism' (sic.) Where the 'old' traditions read every struggle in terms of the traditional vanguard the 'new' traditions look everywhere for new vanguards and forms of struggle. Lastly there are the 'centre points' which "draw on the best elements of the different traditions". As the debate of such attempts to harmonises or usually flounders in lack of depth and conservatism held together by the political skills of leading cadres. (As can be seen in seventy style 'libertarian communism', or the history of the groups around Guy Aldred - or if those examples mean nothing the Liberal/SDP Alliance.)

"To arguments they listen with the ear of a police spy.

In criticising the traditions I don't want to be misunderstood. They only have a disproportionate influence today because the shrinking of wider revolutionary currents leaves few alternatives outside activist groupings. And these have only shallow 'political' ideas - despite their being drawn, often enough, from a more embracing sense of what's wrong with society. This sort of global viewpoint on the misery of life under capitalism - one lacking any detailed understanding of the parts making up the whole - is common among people first becoming aware of alternative ideas and possibilities for activity to those normally on offer. Consequently they are often more receptive to radical ideas than militants in the traditions, who have a vested interest in not devaluing the political capital it's taken them so long to accumulate. (Mind you, Globalism can become a tradition in its own right - see for example the authors of Stop the City Leaflet.) It's because they have a broader view and are open to new ideas that the so-called 'masses' invariably lead the politicians and 'revolutionaries' at the start of any mass struggle. The traditions are attractive because they appear to offer the sort of detailed knowledge of the 'parts' of society that militants lack. The pride of entering these political 'public schools' is the need to accept the narrow perspectives demanded by the traditions 'academics' in order to fit in. For most people that means the loss of the naive utopianism - the sense of what's wrong with society on the grand scale - which brought them there in the first place. And those who eventually graduate or drop out have to unlearn the sectarian ways of thinking and arguing, and the one-dimensional divisions into different and apparently incompatible 'groups' and specialisations. (Playtime is a good example of the problem.) As fewer and fewer militants are enrolling in sects today its not surprising that hardly anybody makes it back out except as isolated individuals in the post-political wilderness. The argument that this is an inevitable situation and that there is no alternative to the sects is like pointing to radicalised ex-catholics as proof of the objectively progressive role of the 'Vatican'.

The decline of the 'revolutionary' currents isn't because there is any less struggle going on in society. Struggle is fundamental to capitalist society because capital cannot reconcile its own needs and goals to the material circumstances it dominates - there are no permanent gains possible on either side of the class struggle. The reverses of recent years have helped produce a situation where on the one hand struggles are consistently failing to break out of their specific situations, and on the other hand amongst proletarians there is no widespread sense of the possibility of fundamental change which might be ignited by struggle. Needless to say these two factors tend to reinforce one another. Obviously the present situation will not last forever - equally obviously things might get a lot worse before getting better. It is always important to try to understand the implications of the general situation for our activity - as it becomes more and more difficult to do so in isolation (even within isolated groups) the traditions come into their own.

"The thoughtless who never doubt
Meet the thoughtful who never act.

People respond to traditional arguments and align themselves in sects because they do reflect in a distorted way the desire for a more fundamental understanding of society, or for a more fruitful focus for activity. I certainly don't criticise people for turning to the traditions in the absence of anything better - having done it myself I've every sympathy with them. Nor am I suggesting that the traditions are 100% counter-revolutionary. Even the worst of them are as ineffective in that direction as any other. They do offer space within which individuals can develop their understanding of this society and of revolutionary opposition to it, a space within which they can come to terms with the change in attitudes towards themselves, the people they know and their material circumstances, which the adoption of a revolutionary perspective makes inevitable. However the lessons are as often learnt in reaction against the sect, as they are taught directly by it. For most people, participation in 'political' groupings provides a crash course in how alienated political relations really are. And by their nature the traditions set restrictive limits to how far people can come to terms with 'being' a revolutionary in a non-revolutionary situation, and also actively perpetuate useless and counter-productive ways of thinking and acting. The problems they purport to address are real problems. They can all be boiled down to the two eternal arguments over the development of understanding and the organisation of struggle. Or in the language of traditionalism 'building the organisation' and 'defending the programme' - or vice versa.

“They doubt, not in order to come to a decision
But to avoid a decision.

So if these are real problems what alternative solution does Playtime offer? No solution at all? That’s almost right. What links us as far as I am concerned is the conviction that while capitalist society or alienated social relations exist, solutions to these problems can only be temporary and achieved in practice. They arise from specific situations and in specific struggles and the response to them. They cannot outlive them except as memory of struggle, as conclusions drawn from it, and as strengthened determination to continue.

As Joe Jacobs put it writing about organisation:

“To think we can establish, even in general terms, a set of objectives/principles which will be a basis for a real ‘revolutionary organisation’ is an illusion. We can and do combine for the realisation of specific immediate projects, and we are obliged to do so. We can and do have ideas/visions concerning the long term future: these change according to the results of current and resulting actions and so on (...) It follows that organisations cannot be established and frozen for very long. They change split or liquidate. As we try to create effective organisation, we wonder why ‘organisation’ is always on the agenda...”

And it could be added, as we try to develop effective understanding, we wonder why ‘theory’ is always “on the agenda.” We don’t see Playtime as having a solution but as having a task — to contribute to the collective struggle against this society by contributing to the active debate about it.

The fundamental criticism of the traditions is that they claim to have or to offer permanent solutions to these problems — though this expresses itself in different ways. As I’ve said before there are no permanent gains to be won in struggle within capitalist society. Those who claim that The(ir) ‘organisation’ or The(ir) ‘theory’ are permanent gains won by The(ir) ‘class’ are perhaps the worst reformists of all.

“They’re heads they use only for shaking.”

However I don’t want to be misunderstood as arguing that the traditions or activism are the ‘enemy within’, or the main problem facing revolutionaries. Nor is our principal task exposing them. Those would, after all, be entirely traditional attitudes. Bordiga (a dead revolutionary) argued that the worst product of Fascism was Anti-Fascism, because it substituted an alliance of ‘progressive forces’ (including ‘progressive’ ‘democratic’ capitalists) against one form of capitalist society, for a revolutionary attack on capitalism as a whole. ‘Anti-sectarianism’ (for example anti-marxism, anti-anarchism, even anti-leftism) is only the feeble echo of anti-fascism in revolutionary circles.

The main enemy we face is the world capitalist system and the alienated, competitive and hierarchical institutions and social relations, which it draws its strength from and perpetuates. The main task for ‘us’ is struggling to advance the movement to destroy it. If the sects and traditions are at worst alienated institutions adapted to capitalist reality, they are still no more central to the task of overthrowing the capitalist state, than any movement co-operative in the task of overthrowing the capitalist economy. They will naturally be expropriated of what is of use, however the main battles will be fought elsewhere.

“With anxious faces they warn the crews of sinking ships
That water is dangerous.

Advancing the case for revolution is something that can only be done collectively. That doesn’t just mean by a group rather than individuals. No person or group of people has sufficient inherent wisdom — or more importantly sufficient understanding of all aspects of society to develop the revolutionary case in isolation. Beyond a certain level ideas can only develop in discussion with others and by taking account of similar discussions elsewhere — wherever they may happen to take place. (That includes the sensible aspects of the traditions of course — but also means actively listening to what’s happening outside them. It also means listening to what is actually said and trying to understand what is meant by it — without becoming so polite that you don’t make your own views clear). For those overwhelmed by the size of this task traditions offer an easy approach to the problem (For a start off by prioritising ‘politics’ or ‘economics’ as the ‘real’ problem), and market easy package deals of ideas and activities. (This doesn’t prevent them, like producers of luxury goods anywhere, from disparaging the cheapest and extra facilities of mass-produced package deal leftist. Leftism returns the insult from the same analogy by calling them petty-bourgeois and meaning home-workers and craftsmen rather than middle-managers).

Even where people are critical of the traditional package deal many persist in working ‘within the tradition’ in the hope of reforming it (the ‘if only we could kick out the wankers strategy’, or more realistically of meeting like minded individuals. Exactly the same arguments used by leftists to justify attempts to ‘use’ or ‘reform’ capitalist unions or parties or institutions. To solve the problem of getting ideas across they find ways to say what they ‘really mean’ using the jargon and catch-phrases of the tradition in question. As far as we are concerned this adds to the problem of understanding what they really mean.

“The proletarian must build up its own ‘bodies of armed men’, its own police force, army, prisons etc. with which to break the resistance of the classes who oppose communism...”

“...the specialist bodies such as police and red army, although controlled by delegates from the councils, must have a permanent existence outside the workers councils.”

“The important positions of power must be filled by clear sighted and dedicated communists. These people will be democratically elected from the soviets and, like all delegated soviet deputies, be subject to recall.”

“When all of humanity has been integrated into the proletariat the basis for separate class interests will no longer exist, and the special bodies of armed men, who enforce the will of the proletariat against the will of other classes, will be superfluous. Then the management of things will replace the management of men.”

“Internationalism
Communist Organisation

More common still today, as even the largest sects are forced to take account of their insignificance, are attempts to find ways of saying 'what we mean' using the jargon thrown up by capitalist politics — because this is terminology people are 'familiar with'. An obvious example, which has interested us is 'democracy'. This sort of usage is liable to cause even greater confusion than unexplained or unintelligible jargon — not least in the minds of the participants who adopt it. I can understand why people do it — it's perfectly possible to 'use' words to convey something beyond what is normally intended. (At the basic level that's what allows the creation of meaning at all). Its easiest in conversation where there is the additional dimension of vocal emphasis, tone of voice etc — and the possibility of asking what meant when you don't understand. It's much more difficult on paper — demanding not just a common language and culture but a clear sense on the part of the writer of who he is writing for. But in all cases it presupposes that the speaker or writer has a reasonably clear idea of what they are trying to say. And in practice this is something few revolutionaries could claim today (we make no claims at all for ourselves).

"Murmuring something about the situation not yet being clarified, the go to bed."

Instead jargon and rhetoric is used to conceal lack of understanding. The result is that groups finish up relying on one or two 'theoretical leaders' to provide the rest with 'fast food' arguments and styles of franchising them to 'the class'. In the 'Speedthinking' approach to politics: "Ch y rd th slmn ? F so y cn bmn a sh ft Rlyny n bld n bg tpm." 'Collective' sets of arguments and parables are developed, which are splendid like magic beads, but which don't thread together into a connected understanding of society and revolution. Instead they roll around loose in the mouths of revolutionaries producing an illusion of intellectual motion and a misty sense of having a 'complete explanation' on the tip of the tongue. I hope I've said enough to make it clear that the answer to this is not threading them together into programmatic rosaries.

Playtime isn't jargon-free of course, and never will be. The difference is that we do actively question our own use of it (if only by putting inverted commas around it 'as you might' 'have' 'noticed'). And we genuinely want you to do the same. Question it that is, not use comma's. And if you're interested but don't understand something challenge us to explain — if we can.

"Their only action is to vacillate."

If I've been talking a lot about jargon and theory and debate it's because I'm talking about all the problems of producing a magazine. It's perhaps worth saying however that we don't see 'theory' or 'discussion' as a precondition or substitute for 'struggle'. Debate is a crucial element in struggle — on it's own it is not just pointless, it is impossible. Explosive social struggles not only can but will occur without 'organisations' having a lead. But unless they take place in the context of a sense of where they are going and how, beyond the level of gut instincts and reactions; in other words, unless they help develop an active debate which involves the mass of the participants because it addresses their experiences and sense of purpose — it might only be expressed in deeds as well as words — then the sort of revolution we 'revolutionaries' want to see will not occur. Those of us who know now that we want to see, and help make, revolution have to be active in waging struggle and debate. But revolutionaries aren't specialists who can distance themselves from 'basic' struggle in order to develop advanced insights.

"Their favourite phrase is: not yet ripe for discussion.

The basic struggle for anyone who hates this society starts where they are — however insignificant or unrewarding that might seem to be. The militant with a solution to every problem but their own is only the other side of the coin from the comfortably placed individual who looks 'elsewhere' for struggle because that doesn't threaten that comfort. At the basic level struggle takes specific forms and demands specific responses. But our own understanding that your own struggle relates to the other struggles in this society — and that only attacking the causes of problems rather than their effects on us will make any real difference — it becomes necessary to work out how struggles are linked and how they are divided. Only with some sense of that does talk of linking up with others struggling in different circumstances have any meaning. That in turn means developing some understanding of this society.

To develop very far it means discussing with other like-minded if not necessarily like-situated people, to go further it must take account of what other groups and individuals are saying. To make any significant impact on events it must go beyond this to developing an active debate amongst those struggling against this society who see the need for nothing short of its destruction and the collective creation of a better one.

Playtimes only function in this as far as I am concerned is to contribute to what debate there is by making our own views known, and — debate a focus for us to develop them. But in isolation from attempts by others to do the same we can do no further than that — indeed its impossible that we could sustain our efforts without ourselves succumbing to the half measures and easy solutions I've been criticising.

What then do we want you to do? We want you to struggle if you are not doing so, and to make what you are doing known to other people. If you still have time and want to write stuff for Playtime great — but we'd be even more pleased to see more papers starting up. And not necessarily involving the amount of resources and fluency in advanced theory that we try to look at as if we have. We'd obviously love to discuss our ideas with other people — but by debate we don't mean encouraging people to write to us so we can criticise their 'incorrect thought'. However we would like to know what you think of Playtime — even if it's just telling us we're a load of rubbish. And of course if you want to help our finances by taking a subscription or buying extra copies . . . ."
Poor old Workers Playtime! The miners’ strike has certainly made you come clean. The latter-day Bolsheviks can carry on selling papers, holding meetings, trying to recruit miners to The Party, no matter whether the miners lose because the NUM gets what it wants, or lose because the NCB and strictly non-interfering friends get what they want. Does it matter to Militant that their call for a 24-hour general strike was passed by? Or to the WRP that the TUC still hasn’t got round to organising the indefinite General Strike? Building the Workers Playtime have given up on the miners as well, but with no consolation in party-building; or perhaps the competition selling papers, holding meetings, trying to recruit miners to The ICC can develop the ‘political avant-garde of the class’; fighting for Marxism in the Labour Movement goes on regardless. The state shows no inclination to back down at all. The ‘drift back to work’ is the only way this strike looks like ending — which is precisely why striking miners have directed such violence at those men going in in the North East, Scotland and Yorkshire (and at NCB property) to put a stop to this ‘drift’. That is precisely why the state has devoted such resources, physical and financial, to getting miners to work, even to get one man into a pit as a symbol.

How can the miners be defeated? Would it be a defeat for the miners to sit it out endlessly and never go back? That is the question that arises if you assume “nothing changes”. For Scargill to sell a face-saver, a lot has to have changed. The NUM is already offering large sums to pack it in. The state shows no inclination to back down at all. The ‘drift back to work’ is the only way this strike looks like ending — which is precisely why striking miners have directed such violence at those men going in in the North East, Scotland and Yorkshire (and at NCB property) to put a stop to this ‘drift’. That is precisely why the state has devoted such resources, physical and financial, to getting miners to work, even to get one man into a pit as a symbol.

Calling for a “more solid strike” implies that in some way working miners have to be persuaded (or forced) out. Picketing has failed. On May 2nd, 10,000 Yorkshire miners failed to stop 200 men working at Harworth in North Nottinghamshire. What ratio of striking miners to working miners would have succeeded? There is simply no way those scab miners will come out. There is no persuasion possible now. If they’d had a national ballot and lost they’d probably have demanded a raffle, and if they’d lost that ... All the rationality of capitalism is with them — and an argument from Playtime (see below). The strike is as solid as it can be.

Until it’s clear what they’re being asked to support, calls to other workers to ‘extend’ the strike are empty. The call for class solidarity regardless of the issues only goes so far (a lot of dockers, some railway workers, not a lot of steelworkers.) If the strike’s about a sectional interest, then for the steelworker it’s fair game to be against steelworks closing. All six remaining Cwnt pits depend on Llanwern steelworks — it’s their sole customer. The South Wales NUM has deliberately avoided any serious picketing of Llanwern or the coke convoys from Port

Our editorial in the last issue was the object of a good deal of debate and rancour between Playmates. Since it appeared it has been the subject of a lot more. Your open letter to us about it was doubly welcome. It helped us to reach conclusions about what we see as the deficiencies of the editorial. But it also indicated to us that there was somebody who took what we wrote seriously enough to take it apart.

Your criticisms relate to our arguments about the miners strike on the one hand, and to our reasons for producing Playtime at all on the other. I’ll deal with these two things separately — first with your criticisms of the editorials arguments.

You summarise us as saying “The NUM controls the strike; only a minority of the strikers are involved actively”, and ask whether we are suggesting the NUM controls the initiatives that have come from the strikers and their families and communities. As you say, patently not. In the editorial we only rather briefly listed the militant initiatives which have marked the strike. Not simply the most militant actions but the determination and spirit shown by over 100,000 miners striking for nine months with the hardship and resistance to State violence that has entailed, and the resourcefulness and courage it has demanded. Of course the NUM doesn’t control the initiatives of the strikers — it can only attempt to channel them for its own ends.

That has been the story of the strike from day one. Scargill and the ‘militant’ faction in the NUM leadership wanted a national strike for their own ends. They were unable to get a ‘democratic’ mandate for one in a series of votes over the last couple of years. The present strike came about through the initiative of the strikers themselves. They responded to the threat to their jobs and communities posed not just by the announcement of specific closures (Cortonwood etc) but by the announcement of McGregor's future plans. For the strikers the issue is clear - that threat must be stopped.
We received this response to the editorial in our last issue (Aug '84) shortly after it appeared, and this reply was written to it in December when we expected this issue to come out. Obviously both the criticism's by Scorcher Publications and our reply are a bit out of date. We decided to publish them anyway. Scorcher Publications can be contacted at Box 56, 108 Salisbury Road, Cardiff.

If the language used by both the strikers and the NUM is the same what is meant by it is rather different. The strikers are not primarily interested in the 'Plan for Coal' but in what McGregor's plan means for the "future of the industry" in concrete terms for them. The 'militant' NUM leadership, by contrast are interested in "defending our members jobs and communities" by ensuring the place of the NUM in determining "the future of the mining industry in Britain". The strikers see the need for a national strike because no one pit or even region can stop the national plan for closures. Scargill and co. see the need for a national strike because the argument about the future role of the NUM can't be settled at the level of any individual struggle - (at the level of 'isolated' closures, specific economic arguments, actual hardship and community devastation etc). It can only be won by making the political price of the NCB plans too high for the NCB & the Government. In those circumstances a new 'accommodation' with the union over the conduct of future industry-wide negotiations would be necessary. Is this what the strikers are after? We think not.

We don't think there would be any disagreement between us about the aims of the strikers and the NUM being different. But if that is the case an obvious question raises itself. Whose aims are currenty put forward? More exactly, since as long as unions and workers co-exist it will never be a completely black and white distinction, whose aims are predominantly at stake. We don’t believe that there could be much doubt about the answer when we produced the last issue or now. It is the NUM’s. The strikers have certainly forced the NUM to move in directions it wouldn’t have chosen. But they are not determining the direction of the strike - and not therefore its goal. At the moment.

You ask "...does the NUM even control (the strike) in the sense that it can get a return to work." As things stand it would be very difficult to 'sell' a sell-out in the militant regions (S.Wales, Yorkshire, Kent etc). However it was our gloomy conviction that it can get a return to work nationally. It would be bitterly resisted by a minority in all areas - perhaps a majority in some - but once the strike was no longer national that leadership and the delegate conference could accept, they would then - and events have if anything reinforced it - that resistance could be isolated and either defused or crushed. Its not as if the precedents don’t exist. The NCB are not currently refusing to negotiate because of any conviction that the NUM would be unable to police an agreement.

In the last week we have seen the delegate conference throw out a National Executive motion on strategy towards the receivership as too moderate. If that indicates the difficulties the ‘militant’ national leadership face it doesn’t alter our belief that any deal Scargill puts his name to will probably be accepted by the delegate conference.

A little further on you read our argument that “for anything better than a face-saving sell out to be a achieved the strike would need to become more solid...” as meaning that working miners should be picketed out. As you rightly say this (as opposed to trying to prevent a drift back) is an wasted effort. Its what we said ourselves in the issue before last. By “more solid” we simply meant the need for more active participation, to give the strike more bite. It could of course have been put more clearly.

You paraphrase us as saying "...some miners have no intention of being starved back, but of fighting "to the finish"..." and ask "what is the ‘finish’ - the face-saving sell out? communism or are the miners in Playtime’s view only capable of the former?!" As you imply communism isn’t (unfortunately) on the agenda. Except of course in the somewhat abstract sense that every struggle since 1848/1871/1914 (delete as appropriate) has posed the question of ‘socialism or barbarism’ blah, blah, blah . . . . . . We are certainly not suggesting that a face-saving sell out is the only possible alternative. There are at least two clear alternatives - clear defeat of the strikers and clear defeat of the Government. And the term sell-out covers a broad range of options with greater or lesser degrees of defeat for either the NCB or NUM. What we are saying is that unless the strikers take the direction of the strike in their own hands a deal along the lines sought by the NUM is the best prospect they could hope for.

By direction we don’t just mean running the strike - in material terms the strikers are running the strike and have done so from the start- we mean determining by their actions the future course of the strike.

You say "The ‘drift back to work’ is the only way this strike looks ending" and "The state shows no inclination to back down at all". But the reason there hasn’t been a sell-out so far isn’t because of the pressure of the strikers on the NUM, or because of Government intransigence. Obviously those are important factors, but the determining element remains the fact that the hardline factions in charge of the NUM and the NCB haven’t caved in or lost control of their respective executives. Despite rumblings in both camps, and attempts in both cases to foment divisions from outside. And despite discontent with their performance expressed (as yet privately) by a minority within both Government and strikers.

At this level what there is to be ‘won’ remains what is on the negotiating table. On neither side have the legs been kicked over or sawn through. Both leading factions are genuinely hardline and both have staked too much to back down unless forced by events or undermined. Its uncommon after many years of dominant ‘consensus’ unionism to see a genuinely ‘militant’ hardline national union leadership. (Hence the difficulty some ‘revolutionaries’ have in criticising it for what it is and does. and the ease with which others have actually supported it.) This definition (‘hardline’/‘genuine militancy’ etc) obviously begs a full discussion of what is involved — but the reality so defined isn’t one of the points at issue between us as far as we can see.

More familiar is the hardline management style displayed by the leading faction in the NCB — not just McGregor & co. past in British Steel, but Michael Edwardes and his successors at British Leyland, or in a different way the ‘businesslike’ management introduced at British Telecom to prepare for privatisation. All were put in by Government as a response to the effects of economic crisis and the needs of state economic policy. The severity of the regime at BL reflects the terminal state of the company when Edwards took over and the crisis in world car production. The hardline approach by McGregor & co. in the NCB reflects the crucial importance of restructuring the coal industry for state directed energy supply policy. But ‘soft’ or ‘hard’ all are just a choice by the Government of the day as to the appropriate tool for carrying out the same job — ‘motivating’ and streamlining the parallel bureaucracies of middle management and union, and breaking entrenched workers power, so that these state controlled monopolies can cut costs and respond to changed demand.

Amongst other things the miners strike is significant as the first industry-wide struggle with hardline factions in charge of the respective union and management. So far neither has lost control to the forces pressuring them from behind. At the moment the principle to be settled isn’t the “Governments right to govern” or the expression of working class power. (Perhaps in light of your criticisms we should emphasise that we don’t see class power as something which is only expressed through revolution, but as one side of the class opposition that is fundamental to capitalism). The strike certainly raises these questions to a degree no strike has since the “winter of discontent”. But so far they have only been raised negatively, as unfilled potential, and they are not — as yet — the issue at stake. That is still the question of how the coal industry is to be managed. In other words how ‘capitalist realities’ are going to be applied — and how much say the NUM has in that process. After nine months of striking the questions are still how many pits? Which pits? On what basis? On what terms?

The process of democratic negotiation between the NUM & NCB is currently deadlocked. The TUC “initiative” seems to be leading nowhere in a transparently desperate attempt to rebuild TUC credibility amongst its ‘moderate’ constituency. The Government has gambled everything on the strike crumbling sufficiently (in numbers or spirit) before February, when coal stocks start to run below the level needed to maintain the CEGB’s so far entirely successful crisis containment strategy. At that point large scale coal movements and extra generating capacity from power stations currently running at low levels will be necessary. The Government clearly hope the strike will be sufficiently weakened by then to police these movements without using politically unacceptable levels of state violence, especially if that is combined with disruption to electricity supply in practise. For the moment they are not sitting still — wherever possible the screws are slowly being put on the NUM leadership which is clearly seen as more of a problem in ending the strike than the activities of the strikers. However it is not necessary for the Government to escalate things at the moment — merely to attempt to contain them. (Indeed they have a positive interest in not creating the sort of incidents that might fuel resistance or sympathy in support of the strike, which has to be balanced against the need to police existing resistance and break the will to struggle).

The NUM’s current interest is in holding the strike ‘solid’ in every sense. Given the relative passivity in the ranks of ‘their’ strikers its necessary to organise (largely symbolic and useless) picketing initiatives to maintain a basic momentum of activity, alongside the propaganda aimed at keeping morale high and ensuring it’s channeled towards the ‘correct’ goals. In addition efforts to prevent ‘drift back’ have to be made. The aim is to keep resistance ticking over until the crucially important time when coal stocks run down. Similarly the propaganda efforts put into calling for ‘Industrial Action’ in support of other ‘trade unionists’ are clearly less calculated at producing results now than in creating a climate in which direct appeals will bear fruit in practise, when the ‘real battle’ starts on the picket lines in a month or two. This is the most the NUM leadership can do in support of their strategy since for them to appeal directly to other groups of workers beyond making public speeches would breach the democratic etiquette amongst trade unions — one set of ‘laws’ the NUM has no intention of flouting. For the strikers however this clearly cannot be enough unless they are prepared to accept what the NUM wants as ‘victory’.

The NUM is committed to a ‘last battle’ when coal stocks run down to the point where targets for activity (large coal movements — power stations coming back on to the grid) are created. This is certainly the only chance for a “union led victory” along the lines of 1972 which might force the NCB to settle. If the strikers want more than that they will have to act on their own initiative. Indeed its arguable that they would have to do so to make the NUM’s risky ‘all or nothing’ strategy work.

Take first the question of ‘forging links’ with other workers. The NUM leadership making speeches clearly isn’t enough. We have argued from the start that — as in any strike — the only effective way of calling on solidarity is for the strikers to identify the relevant groups of workers (those whose action would make the strike bite) and approach them directly. The importance of this is only underlined by the shyness and reluctance strikers generally display about doing this. (Its always "what the union should be doing" when in most circumstances it's the last thing the union wants - and where it does coincide with their ambitions is generally beyond their power to achieve.) That reluctance by strikers and the difficulties it reflects says more about the changed composition and consciousness of the working class than any intellectual sounding 'generalisations from us about the 'destruction of working class community' etc.

We agree entirely with your paragraph about calls to extend the strike being empty unless its clear to other workers what they're being asked to support. But it was never our intention to suggest that this could be done usefully through public 'calls or 'appeals. Such calls (particularly from strikers as opposed to unions) have a limited role in pointing out to people that class solidarity is an issue. But in practical terms they must be regarded as secondary to direct approaches. And at that level it is not a matter of 'class-unifying demands' but of whatever arguments are necessary to achieve results. That is a different matter to 'calling on' other workers to make a 'stand'. In this strike one of the problems is the degree to which the miners see themselves as making a stand rather than waging a fight, and see solidarity in terms of other workers doing the same. Making a stand is, in the literal sense 'voting with your feet' - treating the strike as a political event, in a society where politics are the domain of the ruling class and working class power by contrast means putting the boot in.

Your final paragraph criticises our extremely stupidly worded sentence about anger being turned in a 'practical' direction as meaning that we see class violence as impractical, or somehow secondary to 'forging links' is a reasonable interpretation of what we meant - it's the opposite of what we meant. The only way we can see the current deadlock being broken in a way favouring the strikers is if the anger demonstrated by the militant minority becomes more widespread. Traditional mass picketing was defeated by nationally directed, not policing in the first battle of the strike. Over the last month or so we have seen resistance to state violence turn into violent resistance, and the first instances of successful hit and run picketing. Only if the readiness to do whatever is necessary to make the strike bite is generalised - for a start beyond the battleground of S. Yorkshire - will the question of class power replace the issues the negotiating agenda. It has been obvious from the start that to prevent a deal over closures the strikers would have to do more than break the NCB's determination. It would also mean making the political price of maintaining 'The Resolute Approach' too high for the Government. For all its rhetoric of confrontation the Government has no intention of taking on any single group of power workers directly - as opposed to doing so through its industry board henchmen. They insist on the need to defeat 'Scargillism' but they are still relying on the NCB to do it. For the strikers it must become a conflict directly between them and the State if the sort of victory they want is to become possible. That is still possible - as things stand it is one possibility among others.

It would be easy to become over-optimistic on the basis of the instances of violent escalation of the struggle. It would also be easy to become over-pessimistic as many now are on the basis of the return to work during November. But the facts of the situation must be even more obvious to the miners than the rest of us. As things stand neither success nor defeat are clearly in view for either side. Nor is there any sign of it being possible to agree the deal which has become all too visible in outline during the last two rounds of negotiations. Something has to give - be it patience or nerve - on one side or the other.

The criticisms in your last two paragraphs are clearly those you feel strongest about. We don't suggest this strike is over. No strike is ever over until a return to work has taken place - and sometimes not even then. We believe it's possible for the strikers to win the sort of victory they want. We would like to see signs in what's taking place that that is the most likely outcome. But we can see no point in deceiving ourselves or anyone else that that's the case when it isn't.

Having read us as 'writing the strike off', you see our arguments about the need to develop solidarity between pits for the struggles after this strike is over, as being nonsense. Of course links need to be developed to win this struggle - how else will they be developed. But what are you suggesting is at stake in this struggle? This is an all or nothing attempt to prevent the NCB's current plan being implemented. Its not about whether closures take place or not - its about the timescale of them. Over a short period of time, or over many years (with the possibility of a change of State priorities), Are you suggesting that victory will mean the NUM won't sabotage future struggles? Are you suggesting that the divisions amongst the miners are going to be forgotten? Are you suggesting that once the strike is over that class struggle settled in the mining industry for the next fifty years?

The crucial point as far as we are concerned is the one you put on one side when you say "while this strike is still on, strikers must turn their growing anger, not to winning this strike (in whatever terms they might see winning) but to preparing themselves for a struggle after this strike." We are talking precisely about 'what winning means'. That's what we said back in June. 'There are two things to be won. They can force McGregor to drop his current plans for the industry...just postponing the process of closures would be some sort of result of course...Without the other thing to be won it would be a hollow victory indeed. That other thing to be won is the development of a confidence and solidarity at rank and file level which could mount an effective resistance to closures when they restart.'

However it's all very well being able to 'defend' ourselves from 'misunderstandings' about 'what we really meant'. The fact is that the editorial was written in a way which didn't convey what we wanted to say. Worse still it was written in such a manner - tilled and detached - that makes your assumptions about our attitude to the strike entirely understandable.

The inadequacies of the editorial are largely a result of the circumstances under which it was produced to meet a deadline. Much of what you object to or misunderstand is where we have hastily thrown ideas together without explaining them properly. This is even worse in the second part of the editorial which you don't go on to criticise. There are several passages in that which could be wildly misunderstood. I hope we've said enough to make clear we are aware of that.

This second aspect - the 'attitude' we convey - is perhaps more of a problem than the first. We don't believe that getting our ideas across is just a matter of accurately stating facts or political points. It's also a matter of getting over the attitude underlying why we are writing them. That we produce Playtime because we hate this society, because we are angry at what it does to our class. In practice this obviously isn't clear enough - we have more than once been accused of taking a 'calm', 'detached', 'academic' point of view. We could put it down to our undoubtedly deficiencies as writers and theorists. But that would still not be the whole story, because our deficiencies reflect the weaknesses of the revolutionary circles in this country. Our sense of that weakness was why we started to produce Playtime.

That's the principle difference between us and the groups you line us up with in your first paragraph. We don't produce Playtime because we imagine we have the perfect revolutionary programme, or the right answers for every situation we write about.
According to the strategy of the militant strikers, the cold weather was the miners’ last chance to intensify the strike and turn it to their own account—certainly as far as stopping the Macgregor plan was concerned.

The ‘drift back’ didn’t help coal production figures much, but it was tying down most of the active strikers to picketing pit gates, and usually their own pit. The level of picketing declined after Christmas, and the active minority found themselves spreading more thinly; as they had to turn their attention to stopping the return to work, at the expense of the effort to stop coal movements. Ball restrictions and conditions of sentencing prevented many miners from picketing local pits. In addition, they came up against the conservatism of some branch and area officials, who were reluctant to sanction initiatives which were not closely controlled by the union, such as door-knocking campaigns. The South Wales and Yorkshire NUM areas were obeying injunctions to restrict picketing at some pits to six people.

But even if some of the tens of thousands of strikers who sat out most of the strike at home had begun to take a more active part, the miners would have needed a lot more than food or money. They would have needed physical solidarity. The strategy of the strikers was all along to disrupt the electricity supply industry. But the Central Electricity Generating Board’s crisis policy, designed to take the pressure off power stations in strikebound coalfields where stocks were being conserved or power workers were known to be sympathetic to the strike, succeeded in preventing blackouts. It did this by working some plans beyond their declared capacity (Isle of Grain, Littlebrook), and adapting others to burn fuel oil (Blyth, Aberthaw). Local power cuts for short periods were one consequence of this, as the pressure resulted in a higher number of ‘technical failures’ than usual. But these could no longer be taken as ‘signs’ that the coal strike was putting unbearable pressure on power stations. An overtime ban and work-to-rule by NALGO staff at power stations in January (in pursuit of a 35-hour week), helped to undermine the myth of an imminent collapse by failing to push the electricity supply system over the edge.

The CEBG’s strategy relied on its ability to bring stocks of fuel to the places where it was needed—coal from pitheads by road, rail and sea, and oil. Their task was made easier by small numbers of miners going back to work before Christmas at pits which had, until then, been totally strikebound. Up to that point, they had been content to move small amounts of coal from pits in areas where the strike was less than solid. Later, they began moving coal in larger and larger quantities, with less and less opposition. When the Coal Board decided to put on a show of strength by moving a large quantity of coking coal by road from Shrewsbury colliery, the NUM took up their clearances and called for a mass picket—to which only 200 people turned up.

The CEBG was also relying on the willingness of power workers to handle ‘blackleg’ coal and substitute fuels. In the south, for instance, sympathy action was confined to three coal-fired stations in the Thames Valley, Didcot, Tihbury and West Thurrock. But even here, negotiations on fuel quotas resulted in a return to something like normal production soon after their New Year.

Both these trends would have had to be reversed for the strike to take more effect. It would have meant widespread, mobile and determined action at power stations and pit gates, railway yards, docks and on the roads. Workers who were already supporting the strike directly, by refusing to move coal by rail and sea, would have had to resist mounting pressure and attempts at victimisation from their bosses. British Rail, for instance, was routinely suspending workers who they knew would hold up coal trains.

Others who were supporting the strike half-heartedly or not at all, even though they were in a good position to do so, would have needed to be persuaded to take a different attitude.

None except the more stupid (i.e., barricade) have expected anything from the TUC’s ‘solidarity’ stunts, which were nothing but a diversion. Ridiculous parliamentary lobbies, Coal-not-Dole carnivals complete with clowns and foam rubber Maggie Thatcher souvenirs and so forth only served to enhance the south-east region TUC’s reputation for boorish tokenism (in most people’s eyes, anyway: groups like the Labour Party Young Socialists were still demanding that the TUC call a general strike a week after the miners went back). Already well practised in the staging of symbolic Moments of Action, SERTUC decided in the autumn to ‘mobile’ weekly shows-of-weakness outside West Thurrock power station—which had already been shut down as the result of the actions of its own workers (the only power station in the region to do so). While it busied itself trying to find a ‘middle ground’ between the government and the miners’ union, the TUC could be counted on to do everything in its power to dissipate and waste any real sympathetic impulse among trade unionists.

As for the prospects of an early settlement together with a unified return to work, such a possibility was growing smaller all the time. But minutely-choreographed shifts in the attitudes of the negotiation parties, and the constant rumours of talks-talks and new ‘forms of words’, largely succeeded in shifting attention away from the fight in the coalfields, transport and at power stations, where the original objectives of the strikers would be won or lost.

Over the years, we have become used to seeing strikes openly isolated and sold out by unions, or at least the facts could be compressed into such an interpretation. The fact that there was a militant union leadership in the coal strike, makes the standard categories of ‘militant workers’ vs. ‘reactionary bureaucrats’ harder to insert into political accounts of the strike. This has led to some bizarre contortions among far- and ultra-left groups. Some have got round the problem by basing their analyses on a selection of anecdotes which yield the correct insights (for instance, union officials asking pickets to disarm). Some ‘revolutionaries’ said maybe the NUM should have held a national strike ballot after all. Others queued to do disappearing acts up the NUM’s backside, notably the Socialist Workers Party, which

Police accuse Scargill of clouding the truth

STATEMENTS by the miners’ "demagogic leader" that their fight was for the whole working class are clouding the truth about the part of police in the dispute, says the Police Federation.

2 MINERS 'PUT BOOT IN' COURT TOLD

publicly stuck to its line of championing rank-and-file militancy as the way to win the strike, at the same time as it was privately conceding defeat and preparing to ‘retrive within the traditional grounds of the working class’. Both attitudes betray a contempt for ‘ordinary’ workers by the way they manage to avoid talking about the real relationship between unions and strikers.

Since the early weeks of the strike, which was not started on the union’s terms but began as an initiative by miners threatened with immediate redundancy, the NUM had succeeded in establishing its control over the direction of the strike and in limiting its aims to strictly defensive and reformist aims, even though these aims have been pursued very militarily and sometimes violently. But it should be clear that the strikers and their leaders meant different things by the slogan ‘No Pit Closures on Economic Grounds’ and that they were making a different set of calculations about the strike. The MacGregor plan was bad news for both the miners and the NUM. But factors outside the direct control of the strikers, such as national energy policy or the attitude of governments to import controls, the value of the national currency and subsidies for nationalised industries, are factors upon which the union aspires to have a direct influence. As middlemen in the labour market, the union is threatened on two fronts: first, the loss of members, and possibly the end of its negotiating monopoly if profitable pits are returned to private ownership. Secondly, the union is worried less about the immediate survival of government, employer, and union, to which the NUM became accustomed during the 1970s. This has been the real argument between the NUM and the government, behind the rhetoric of ‘Honouring the Plan for Coal’ from one side, and ‘Management’s Right to Manage’ from the other. As far as the union is concerned, the Plan for Coal was a sacred document, not so much because it sanctified particular production targets or levels of employment in the industry, as because it enshrined the principle of NCB/NUM joint consultation.

Now the NUM feels itself being elbowed out, as management opts to deal more directly with its workforce, which means pressuring the union into a more subservient role. The high eminence to which the NUM rose during the 70s was the result of a conjunction of circumstances—the full development of the national power grid, rising oil prices, the infancy of nuclear technology—which gave the miners a powerful (but temporary) strategic weapon in their fight for higher pay, better conditions and secure employment. The idea that the miners possessed a traditional industrial might (as distinct from an exceptional degree of rank-and-file solidarity) is nothing but a leftist myth; during the sixties, many miners were forced by pit closures to move into search of work. While this strike was from the union’s point of view a struggle to regain lost strategic ground by forcing the government to change its priorities, it was by no means the NUM’s only line of defence. While the contraction of the industry and mass redundancies would undoubtedly put the union in difficulties, it could still survive as a union with a negotiating monopoly over a smaller workforce in a technology-intensive industry. If the NUM could obtain a closed shop among the new layer of technical staff which would be created as coal production came under computerised, integrated, automated mine operating systems. But to make this transition, it would need the consent and assistance of management, and, ultimately, governments. The point is that whether the union wears its militant face or its bureaucratic face according to the moment, it is an organisation which has to adapt to changing capitalist priorities. While it may choose to use workers’ struggles to try and change those priorities, the workers themselves are engaged in an endless and fundamental struggle against the implications of capitalist reality itself.

Striking miners must have known, as the union does, that it isn’t a question in the end of whether the industry is restructured, rather of how and when. The MacGregor plan meant mass sackings, pit villages being Commissed, communities broken up, miners forced to be more flexible, more ‘responsive to the needs of the industry’. Their calculation was that this could be held off for at least a few years, and many strikers must have had an eye on the possibility of the government rethinking its energy policy in favour of coal. It was always a long shot. To restate domestically-produced coal as the country’s primary energy source, the government would have to be persuaded by an overwhelming combination of political and economic pressures. As it is, British coal’s sudden attractiveness on price is the result of a sterling crisis which probably won’t last long. Even if it does, other considerations make a major change of emphasis unlikely. The CEB’s plans to expand its nuclear generating capacity have run into a number of problems, but during the strike nuclear power has been pushed very importantly as a permanent alternative to coal. The aim of the government and CEB is to create a more broadly-based generating industry using a number of different technologies, which would be less vulnerable to political pressures and fluctuations in the price and availability of fuels from different sources.

Arguments from some quarters on the left—that the strike and its effects have set the coal industry so far back as to make the MacGregor plan redundant anyway, and represented feeble attempts to construct capitalist-sounding reasons for letting the strikers off the hook. They were also, indirectly, an admission that any victory on the issue of pit closures would have been temporary.

By the end of the last year, North Dorbyshire was being promoted by the NCB as the hammer of the NUM, as each week large numbers of miners were returning to work.

Mr. Moses had broken the mould; others, who had at best doubted his tactics, were now following. It was a carefully, thought-through, plan; the months of waiting his turn to attack the NUM. ‘I’ve never opposed the NUM as an idea; I’ve always been for it, but I’ve never thought that it’s to our advantage to have a strong union proper.
both physically (by the police) and politically (by the NUM, with its strategy of area-by-area balloting).

The NUM was taking a calculated risk when it decided to go for a national strike last March. On previous occasions it had, in fact, deliberately suppressed strikes and closures because it thought it would be unable to turn them into the kind of strike it wanted, on the terms it wanted. In 1983, it ignored an 80% strike vote in South Wales, while Yorkshire officials dissuaded miners at the new Selby super-pits from striking in sympathy. In Scotland, a strike and sit-in at Kinneil was pacified by Mick McGahey in person.

Again, this was not because the union had decided to reveal itself as the deadly enemy of the workers, but in line with the different priorities of the NUM. When the NCB's March closure plan was announced, and was met with immediate walkouts, the NUM judged that both the severity of the closure programme and the strength of the response would be sufficient to sustain a unified official strike which could be directed at forcing the government and NCB to negotiate on their future plans for the industry, in terms favourable to the NUM. They hadn't done their groundwork very well; the pit closure programme would affect different areas very differently, and while there is no perfect correlation between the intensity of miners at individual pits and the immediate prospects for those pits under the NCB's plan, the unanimity of the strikers in (for instance) Kent and South Wales clearly related to the seriousness of the threat posed to jobs and to the quality of life in general. The failure of the strike in Nottinghamshire has nothing to do with any 'scab tradition', and everything to do with the fact that Nottinghamshire is a profitable coalfield which will attract heavy investment in the future, with the (relatively) good chance of alternative local employment even if one or two pits were to close, and with the relatively dispersed nature of the mining 'communities' in those areas.

Further emphasising this division is the fact that in 1979 the NUM agreed to the introduction of differential bonus schemes, under which miners at highly profitable pits earn much more money than miners at older pits which have not attracted as much investment and where productivity is therefore lower.

The question of why the miners' strike failed to spark off a wave of sympathetic actions, and why it did not apparently give encouragement to other groups of workers to pursue their own demands, must also be seen in terms of the aims and context of the strike.

From the beginning, the NUM and the left coasted their arguments in terms of honouring agreements signed with Mrs. Thatcher herself, 'protecting the British coal industry from heavily-subsidised foreign competition', in terms of 'fighting for the right to work' and 'keeping jobs down the pits for future generations'. These arguments may have had some appeal for Labour traditionalists and liberal bleeding hearts, but they were hardly calculated to raise the temperature of the class struggle. Of course, we would not expect the union to pitch its propaganda at any other level than social patriotism and attachment to the job. Many of the strikers would put their case differently in private, where 'it's time to care less whether more or not to go back to any more, and the last thing they want is to see their children working as coalminers. But in public, even the most militant strikers have allowed the union to speak for them, on its own terms. So it's little wonder if other workers have used this as an excuse for treating the miners' strike as if it were a purely sectional dispute which had nothing to do with them. Why should other workers support the demand for unconditional guarantees of employment in the coal industry, especially if such a demand comes from the workers in the unprofitable pits? Why not continue a commodity of entrepreneurial flair in adversity—and when his chairman and the Cabinet look round for senior appoint-
"Society does not develop in a continuous way, free from setbacks, but through conflicts and antagonisms. While the working class battle is widening in scope, the enemy's strength is increasing. Uncertainty about the way to be followed constantly and repeatedly troubles the minds of the combatants; and doubt is a factor in division, of internal quarrels and conflicts within the workers' movement.

"It is useless to deplore these conflicts as creating a pernicious situation that should not exist and which is making the working class powerless. As has often been pointed out, the working class is not weak because it is divided; on the contrary, it is divided because it is weak. And the reason why the proletariat ought to seek new ways is that the enemy has strength of such a kind that the old methods are ineffectual. The working class will not secure these ways by magic, but through a great effort, deep reflection, through the clash of divergent opinions and the conflict of impassioned ideas. It is incumbent upon it to find its own way, and precisely therein is the raison d'être of the internal differences and conflicts. It is forced to renounce outmoded ideas and old chimeras, and it is indeed the difficulty of this task that engenders such big divisions."
