THE STRIKE AT PARKINSON COWAN

On Tuesday after Easter, 700 workers at Parkinson Cowan in Stretford went back to work after a seven week strike. The way the strike was ended showed how ruthless and cynical the trade unions can be in opposing workers' struggles.

The 'final offer' put to the workers was a complicated package. No-one seemed to understand. But it is clear that there was no significant improvement on the 7.8% which had been rejected at previous meetings. The management was also of the firm opinion that the strike lasted in the form of a £20 'cash bonus' and payment for the Easter bank holidays if they went back after Easter.

No doubt this seemed attractive to many of the workers who were beginning to feel that 7.8% was the best that they were going to get.

The unions eagerly seized on this chance to put the boot in. The AUEW district organiser who addressed the meeting urged acceptance of the same offer he had called on workers to reject the week before. When he was asked what would happen if the offer was rejected he replied that the union had already decided to cut off strike pay whatever the outcome of the meeting.

Not surprisingly the meeting voted to end the strike by a majority of about 3 to 1. Afterwards the opinions expressed about the unions by workers who had voted to stay out were mostly unprintable. But many of them were not surprised by the way the unions had acted. The reputation of the AUEW in particular (the most influential of the seven unions involved) is already at rock-bottom in the Manchester area. The AUEW's treatment of the workers at Laurence Scott will not be forgotten for a long time. And the strikers at Parkinson Cowan had already been forced to picket AUEW HQ in London to get their strike pay.

All this shows how workers less and less see the unions as their own organisations. The struggle against union sabotage is accepted as just 'normal' a part of going on strike as picketing. In other words, workers expect to be 'sold out' by their unions.

However, the strike at Parkinson Cowan shows that workers now urgently need to organise the traditions and practices of trade unionism. This strike, like so many others, could only be broken in the way it was after seven weeks. It was inevitably weak.

LAW AND ORDER

Before the Falkland Islands came to dominate the news we were subjected to a media deluge about law and order. Crime figures were released, for the first time, broken down by race. A false media image was created of black muggers beating up little old ladies, sounding at times like an editorial from a National Front newspaper. It was of course forgotten that, according to a recent report, national minorities were more likely to be the victims of violent attack than the white population.

Manchester's Chief Constable, James Anderton, in a speech released to the press attacked 'subversives' who he claimed were 'brainwashing' people into rioting, and complained that 'basic issues in the field of law and order are increasingly submitted to a vote.' He called for the police to be given even greater independence and condemned attempts to make the police accountable.

The police federation launched an advertising campaign in support of capital punishment. Lord Scarman warned that troops may be used in the event of further rioting this summer. Ex-chief of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, Kenneth Newman, was appointed as the new Metropolitan Commissioner - a man with much bloody experience of putting down urban unrest.

These apparently isolated events are part of a gross failure within British society. This summer's riots were a profound shock to the state. For a while the police lay accused of overreaction and excessive brutality. Lord Scarman tried to placate the urban centres with talk of 'community policing'. A 'battle of law and order' brigade are preparing public opinion in case of more rioting this summer. The police have carefully prepared their weapons and tactics, learning from the experience of N. Ireland. If they can create the impression in the public mind of themselves as the 'thin blue line' preventing society's drift into chaos they can justify any amount of brutality, including, as Scarman has said, the use of troops. For the truth is that the inner cities, with rising unemployment and falling social expenditure, are becoming ungovernable by democratic means.

CONTINUED OVER
UNITY AGAINST THE CUTS

COUNCIL CUTS

Following our report in the last issue of Wildcat on Council cutbacks, it has been confirmed that major redundancies among Manchester City Council workers have been avoided, although not without substantial job losses through early retirement and non-filling of vacancies. The Council has responded to the determination of Council workers to take 'indeterminate strike action' should there be any compulsory redundancies. Unfortunately this impressive display of unity amongst Council workers in all the main unions covering white-collar and manual workers has been marred in two specific areas.

At the last general meeting of Manchester NUM, only a minority of people were willing to support 14 playground workers who, although not directly employed by the Council, were losing their jobs as a direct result of the City Council's decision to withdraw its financial support and close down the playgrounds. A trade appeal for support was made by the playground workers themselves and by supporters in NUM, but the branch executive (through one of its members - who is a leading light in the local Communist Party) managed to argue on formalities and technicalities (i.e. that no request had been received from the playground workers' union, that no strike action had been directly employed by the Council) and to persuade the meeting to reject the appeal for support.

It seems likely that many workers regard this particular job as somehow non-essential, even though it is more directly useful and less bureaucratic than many Council services. Unfortunately the low esteem in which much child care is held helped to undermine support for the workers.

Another chink in the armour of Council workers' unity has been the lack of support for short-term contract workers in education. Despite the NUT's continual meaning that more and more of these 'non-permanent' contracts are being used in education, many such workers have lost their jobs during the recent cutbacks. Again the employers have managed to divide one group of workers against another, this time along the lines of 'temporary' versus 'permanent'.

The outcome of those first two real tests of council unity to resolve to fight redundancies does not bode well for the future.

Come June or July this year following the Council elections there is likely to be further pressure for cut-backs and redundancies. The Tories and the alliance are publicly committed to reducing the numbers of staff employed by the councils. Labour, although theoretically opposed to cut-backs, are just as committed to the same system which has caused this crisis, and have shown by their record in office to be unwilling to fight back in any way that will risk their re-election. The position in control of the Council. In the last resort they will cut our throats to save their own necks.

In this situation we can only rely on ourselves. We must build on the unity we have achieved, so far, and go beyond the divisions of 'essential' and 'white collar', 'permanent' and 'temporary', 'essential' and 'non-essential'. More than this we must break with the divisions of the trade union mentality and trade union organisation, both to defend ourselves and move forward to a better world.

CND: NO RETURN TO THE SIXTIES!

First time round, in the sixties, CND failed miserably ... Then it based its tactics on polite marches, lobbying MPs, and trying to get the Labour Party to support unilateral disarmament. It got this support, only to find the Labour governments 'defence' policy no different from that of the Tories. The Bombs bomb movement melted away like snow in the Sahara.

Since popular revolution with the new generation of nuclear weapons, and the realisation that war preparations are escalating in both super-power blocs, we have learnt the lesson of the anti-war movement. Phoenix-like, CND has re-emerged from the ashes of despair. The movement is strong, and the US government has expressed fears that European 'neutralism' could destroy NATO.

CND's tactics are the same today as they were twenty years ago. Is there any reason to suppose they will be more successful this second around? CND says it opposes nuclear weapons while supporting the need for 'national defence'. In the past 30 years we have had more wars and more deaths than in all the world's wars before. CND and its allies have been found to be a tool of the army and the arms industry. It is no coincidence that the government has prepared for war to defend markets and raw materials, they use unemployment and state repression to attack our living standards in order to support the profits of the arms industry.

The Falkland crisis shows that CND is prepared to support war fought with conventional weapons. But nuclear war cannot be uninvolved. As long as the threat of war remains, so does the threat of nuclear war.

According to CND, wars are caused by the evil actions of a few politicians and generals. In fact, wars are always fought over basic issues like control of markets, or, as in the case of the confrontation in the Falklands, the control of resources of raw materials and to secure a new market. War is simply the natural extension of the commercial competition which is the basis of capitalism.

Just as governments prepare for war to defend markets and raw materials, they use unemployment and state repression to attack our living standards in order to support the profits of the arms industry.

"The next five years will be the testing ground and the pressures are already building up. Police presence in this coming five year period will determine the kind of society in which we will be required to live."

Nuclear disarmament is much harder than CND claims. It requires a realisation that politically attacking the virtue of governments has never worked and never will go anywhere. It requires direct action, decided upon and controlled by those participating. Every strike, occupation and act of resistance which challenges the logic of capitalism and the authority of the government should be seen as part of the movement against war.

Ultimately it's a question of confronting the reality of capitalism and all the organisations which challenge - of making a choice between a libertarian communist revolution and a radiocapitalist barbarian, that's a choice we cannot refuse to make.
