PITTED AGAINST THE STATE
The miners have committed themselves to an all or nothing fight with the NCB and the Government over their futures in the coal industry. That they cannot afford to lose is obvious. What isn't so obvious after three months on strike is what they can win.

There are two things to be won. They can force Macgregor to drop his current plans for the industry. In reality this will mean the NUM negotiatiing 'something better' on their behalf. Today Scargill says jobs and closures are not negotiable. What he means is that he will have to be forced to swallow them. Between the NUM and the NCB the argument is merely about different interpretations of what 'the good of the industry' is. At best this means a new 'Plan for Coal'. At best it means replacing the short sharp shock MacGregor wants with a slower wind-down. This is clearly what the NCB would settle for if they have to. For them the strike isn't just about closures, it's about trying to break the miners spirit. About reinforcing the divisions between miners, and confining opposition to a minority in each affected pit and region. Everyone else having been forcibly pursued of the 'inevitability of it all', of the 'pointlessness of resistance'.

The return to a slow run down within the guidelines of a new 'Plan' is what the NUM will settle for too. They understand the 'realities' of the capitalist marketplace. Without subsidies — out of the question from this government — British coal is uncompetitive. Closures are the 'inevitable' result. The only thing to be negotiated is the speed and the price of them. They know their best hope is to set the terms of the negotiations over future closures in advance with a national agreement. That is what they will accept if they are allowed to determine the level of struggle and its goals.

Presuming neither side decisively defeated the other the NUM and NCBs settlement would remove the threat of compulsory redundancies. Better terms would be offered. Some closures would be put off for a year or two — this to be sold to the miners in the hope that a Labour government will be elected, or an upturn in the market will occur. None of this will be easy for either side — one facing its members, the other facing the government. That is why this strike has been a long one and could go on much longer still, inflicting in the process the maximum damages on the finances and morale of the miners themselves.

Just postponing the process of closures would be some sort of result of course. It would demonstrate if nothing else determination not to be passively subjected to market forces. But for those miners in the affected pits the months or years of extra work wouldn't enable them to make up the money lost in the strike. Without the other thing to be won it would be a hollow victory indeed. That other thing to be won is the development of a confidence and solidarity at rank and file level which could mount an effective resistance to closures when they restart. The divisions between miners that have deepened in the course of this strike show the problem clearly.

The miners strike is the first national industrial action over jobs for many years. All other recent industry wide strikes — steel, firemen, health workers, lorry drivers etc — have been over pay. (In the steel strike the unions manoeuvred anger over closures and redundancies into a strike over pay). This already moves the struggle off the ground which unions are happiest fighting on. (The NGA — a similarly 'militant' union facing equally large problems failed in its attempts to broaden its Warrington dispute with Eddie Shah beyond the question of sympathy action for the 'Stockport Six', and into the wider confrontation around technological threats to unionisation it wanted). This strike has built on the back of an overtime ban called in response primarily to a pay offer. (And when it comes to negotiating the end of the strike "winning" last year's pay rise will figure in the list of "concessions").

The 'militant' national leadership of the NUM have wanted a national strike on the question of jobs for some time. But three ballots on the question have gone against them — though the last of these was a 'calculated' defeat to stop protests at the closure of Lewis Merthyr colliery last March spreading into an unwanted strike over one closure. (See Playtime April '83). Scargill has been anxious not to make the mistake the NGA did over Warrington — tying a 'confrontation' with the NCB/Government to one pit closure. The NUM have no answer to the NCB's economic arguments in any particular case — sharing as they do the same capitalist logic. The NUM's case is national — for NUM involvement in deciding the 'future of the industry'.

This strike came about as spontaneously as the near strike last March. This time however the NUM leadership thought something might be made of it. It began on the shaky foundation of the overtime ban, which groups of miners had already attempted to break. The national leadership had won agreement for the ban over the question of pay. Overtime bans are a traditional barometer for testing militancy. In this case it was clearly hoped that the hardship it caused miners - tied into the circuit of mortgage and credit debts to a much greater extent than in '72 or '74 - would generate anger that could be channelled into a 'show-down' with the NCB this winter. (The overtime ban supposedly reducing the level of coal stocks before then.)

However it also came at the end of a series of pit closures, in which resistance (seldom solid in the first place) had been suppressed by the regional or national NUM executives. (Most notably at Lewis Merthyr and at Polmaise in Scotland last winter - both in traditionally militant areas). The direct catalyst to the present strike was the announcement of the closure of Cortonwood colliery in militant S.Yorkshire. Having established at a show of hands on March 4th that Cortonwood itself was 'nearly unanimous' in favour of strike action the regional executive called a regional strike confident of overwhelming support in their area. Scotland followed suit. Though rumblings of discontent were audible elsewhere the strike would probably have remained regional. However MacGregor at this point announced his plans for the industry. That production targets had been set which involved the closure of between 20 and 28 pits and at least 20,000 jobs over the next year. He also warned that this would involve 'if necessary' the industries first compulsory redundancies. This deliberate challenge brought out other areas, some by executive strike call, some after ballots. Some ballots were against striking however.

Scargill and the 'militant' NUM leaders waited for a 'domino effect' to occur - one area following another out on strike, or being picketed out by miners from other areas. This avoided a national ballot which they weren't sure of winning until some weeks into the strike, and which in some areas would clearly have lost - risking a refusal to strike in those areas. On the other hand if the strike didn't spread or the militancy proved not to be there the 'militant' leaders wouldn't have shot their bolt - knowing that they would be unlikely to have a second chance for the sort of union run national strike they wanted.

While this strategy of inaction worked its course, Scargill spent the first two weeks of the strike in the High Court, arguing over the unions' pension fund strategy.

The 'domino effect' strategy suited the executive - it sowed the seeds of future problems. Though confrontation had been signalled for long enough for the NCB and Government to make preparatstations and coal depots dispensations allowing coal through for essential services, negotiated between unions, has made nonsense of the picketing. Where other tactics developed such as the motorway blockades it has been on a wildcat basis and the executives have stepped in to stop it. Miners have been warned that if they picket anywhere except where they are sent by the union they won't be legally represented by the union if they finish up in court. More crucially the executives have taken tight control of funds, refusing travel and petrol expenses for any but authorised activities. Since the unions intelligence systems are far less effective than the police's this means that the only hope of making picketing more effective by responding quickly to events on the ground is lost. And since the strike has gone on long enough for the miners own financial reserves to have gone, it means that where they are unable to get their hands on donations direct they are restricted to what the union will permit them to do.

As a result the most innovative actions of the strike so far have been those of the women support groups. These groups have sprung up more or less spontaneously — admittedly helped by a social welfare worker or two. But unlike their role in previous strikes as a support group they have become active in furthering the strike in their own right. (It has to be said that as activity by 'wives' this has been welcomed by the miners. Attempts at solidarity by women workers like nurses and office workers has not infrequently run into entrenched male chauvinism.)

The NUMs strategy of vainly trying to match the police in set piece picketing and appealing to other union leaderships to police the blocking of coal moves can only lead to defeat. Its move towards staging rallies like those at Mansfield and Sheffield cannot compensate for this. It can only put in doubt even the 'victory' the NUM leadership is seeking - a new 'plan for coal' to agree the rate at which closures are staged and jobs are sold. The union has defined one court injunction and will defy any more. But that is as far as its 'militancy' will extend. From the start the NUM has been dependent on rank and file initiative - the low level of active support amongst miners has lead it to try to offset this by strictly controlling activities. Thats not to say that they wouldn't welcome miners initiatives to raise the level of struggle - knowing that the control of strike funds and communications they already hold make it unlikely it could 'get out of hand.' But the bureaucratic stranglehold they have already developed can only act to 'defuse militancy and initiative. Their strategy can only lead to a 'sieve mentality' as greater and greater efforts are put into simply surviving the hardship imposed by the strike, in an almost certainly doomed race to outlast coal stocks.

The miners can only win anything by taking over the extension of the strike themselves. What is urgently needed are local victories - the closure of the steelworks, or the blocking off of non-union ports. Only some sort of success will encourage those strikers who are not taking an active role to get involved. The only alternative is to trust Scargill and follow his 'militant' lead into a drawn out and financially crippling strike. That is why the myth of that 'militancy' has to be exposed and cast aside. Scargills role at the end of the day is that of every other union leader - not 'Mine Fuhrer' but Herr Peace.

MINERS! BY THE LEFT! QUICK MARCH!

The free spirit of working class solidarity is alive and well in East London if the enthusiasm and commitment generated there by the Miner's strike is anything to go by. The dispute has galvanised Labour party activists in the area as few recent issues have succeeded in doing - because once again the men and women of the NUM are in the vanguard of the fightback against a reactionary Tory Government and its coercive laws. As Chris Morris, press officer for the Hackney trade union sub-committee puts it, "This is the one people have been waiting for. With the miners in the fight we know we can win."

"Surely the miners strike presents us with the perfect opportunity to explain and even clarify the deep division between state socialism and anarchism." - Freedom, May 1984

The working class is perhaps big enough not to give a dog's biscuit about the deep division between the Plan for Coal and the Anarchist Plan for Coal ("Abolish the Coal Board. The mines belong to the miners."). But Freedom has stumbled across a rich seam of truth : the strike has been the signal for every creeping variety of opportunist to mystify and even moralise upon the deep division between workers in struggle and parasites like themselves ...

... Swarming over the body of the working class, contorting grotesquely in the fight for improved positions, sharpening their needle-like ideological teeth, sucking out bloody validations, digesting them and trying to poison the host with their excrescences, secreting subtle webs of myth and distortion, filling the air with their buzzing ...

WE'LL LET THEM STARVE!

Moss Evans, left wing general secretary of the TGWU, promised that his union wouldn't let the miners be "starved back to work". What altruism! (Visions of grimy, emaciated faces beaming with gratitude as Moss serves up the dumplings and gravy). Of course, if they are forced to submit by anything less than famine, tough. Charity begins at home.

Evans' sickening sanctimony is echoed throughout the left and its publications. Every week they print pictures of pickets getting shit beaten out of them by the police. What a morale-booster. Aren't we high enough on righteous indignation? Or is there another message for the working class? The left's journalism - showing miners getting humiliated, and writing up the strike in a 'positive' way - contains the same message as the mainstream propaganda it deplores. But the left turns issues of struggle into moral points. What can they say when workers block motorways, burn down signal boxes and sabotage vehicles? In public they ignore it, in private they apologise - "oh, well the workers are forced to do these things". As long as they feel they can point to the other side using dirtier dirty tricks, as long as the workers take care not to outdo situation decisively. But unfortunately it is also likely that the strike will run its course without us having any such decisive effect. So what can we do? The key weakness is a weakness of leadership. The key thing we have to do — and we shouldn't be ashamed about this — is to build the network of revolutionary militants in the class necessary for the battle afterwards.

How do we get to that minority? First of all, the bosses in skulduggery, the left will turn a blind eye, or even defend them. The left always ends up promoting a double standard. In its efforts to extract political capital from the struggle, its posture of outraged surprise barely conceals the underlying cynicism.

LET'S RETURN TO THE 20's!

Digging around for sacrificial models to project onto the working class, the left turns its attentions to the past. What a rich haul it has plundered from the tomb of working class history. The long strike of 1926, which ended in starvation and defeat, is repeatedly held up as the shining example of noble struggle in the face of suffering. Thus the left tries to wrap the shroud of the past round the miners strike in 1984. If they consent to this kind of treatment, they'll deserve socialism. The left is promoting the sacrificial myth of the miners as the finest warriors among the ranks of the workers — the ages who might just be able to save us all.

Tribune (4/5/84) carried an article under the headline "WHEN THE NOTTS MINERS STOOD BY THE UNION", playing up the appeal of the past for all it was worth. For 11 years after 1926, Nottinghamshire miners struggled bitterly against a scab union set up by George Spencer. The final outcome was a deal between the employers, the Spencer union and the predecessor of the NUM; one which angered many Notts. miners. And in 1984 Spencer is no longer around to set them up for division and defeat. Instead they have the NUM, which helped sow the seeds of disunity by agreeing to differential bonuses between pits; which repeatedly suppressed and isolated groups of miners struggling against pit closures, until it could get a dispute on its own terms; which even now is fettering the pickets by jealously controlling communications and money for transport.

In getting round this and the other obstacles they face, the miners will find themselves burying large chunks of their 'heritage'. They will need to rely on direct contacts among themselves and with other workers, in order to outflank the bureaucracy (fk the Cripple Alliance); and on their own ingenuity to outwit a well-organised, tool-ed Plod.

The miners do not carry the burden of the whole British working class on their backs, no matter how hard the left tries to nail them to the cross, no matter how hard it tries to obscure the real issues of this struggle by flinging shit in peoples eyes.

DEMOCRACY: NOW YOU SEE IT...

The left's line on the 'democracy issue' in this dispute betrays the double standard in another way. When it suits them, the left uses all the arguments to hand in democracy's favour. They will use democratic structures, for instance, to deny a 'platform' to groups they don't like. They make a distinction between 'workers' and 'bourgeois' democracy, the distinction being that 'workers' democracy, whether by ballot or show of hands, produces the right decisions. When necessary, the left will call for something called 'Active Participatory Democracy'. This means excluding part of the electorate on the grounds that they don't 'Participate' enough, i.e. they don't usually attend meetings.

But when, as in the early weeks of the miners' strike, the wrong side wants a National Strike Ballot, lo and behold! The left sees the light! Democracy is just a bourgeois charade! Only the miners on strike have the right to decide whether or not to stay out! They understand that workers' own struggles, which almost always begin with militant action by a minority, makes nonsense in practice of the 'majoritarianism' (the idea that nothing should take place unless a majority agrees) and the institutional separation of decision-making and acting that democracy enshrines.

Thus, they sneeringly point out that Thatcher is all in favour of letting the miners have their say, but doesn't want a GLC election next year because the result could be embarrassing. Precisely. The left's opposition to a National Strike Ballot is no less opportunist. It will attach itself to 'democratic' ideology wherever that ideology can provide a lever for its own bureaucratic ambitions. In private, a leftist will darkly admit that the 'real' issue is not one of democracy, but one of class power. They're merely trying to trick the workers into taking it. For themselves, of course. After the transition, with its fetish for the airing of opinions and the moment of decision as a preliminary to action, offers nothing to workers. It offers everything to those who would divert, institutionalise or block their struggles, whether from the left or from the right.

TOGETHER, WE CAN'T WIN!

The mindless triumphalism and empty sloganeering of the left has reached new heights during the miners strike. The more often they scream 'The Miners CAN Win', 'Solidarity WILL Win', the more abstract this Winning, this Solidarity, becomes. Rarely does the left venture to suggest what 'victory' might mean, or how long it will last (except of course that it means 'Maggie' being 'Out').

Every week, Socialist Worker leads with a variation on the same slogan. Six weeks ago, they told the workers that Macgregor was 'rattled'. They told us he was 'rattled' again last week. Time and time again over the last 2 months it seems we have been on the verge of a general strike.

But the masses cannot be allowed in on the more sophisticated insights of the left, for obvious reasons; the masses probably wouldn't take to them very warmly. In private, the left is gearing up for a defeat — not theirs, the workers' — no matter what they say in their papers. The theorists are already weighing up the 'balance of class forces', in their oily palms, calculating the probabilities, selecting scapegoats, perfecting the 'lessons' to be 'applied'. For in the end, it doesn't much matter to the left whether it makes its gains on the back of a victorious working class, or one demoralised and defeated.

Socialist Worker
The police tactics used during the miners' strike show that the ruling class have learnt a great deal from the class struggle (both in work-places and on the streets) over recent years. Now they are responding accordingly. It's time for a working class counter-response.

Many of the recent police actions are nothing new. Over the past three months we've seen:

1) The routine and fairly overt phone-tapping of union offices and similar intelligence gathering procedures (no doubt with the help of their fellow trade unionists in the civil service - the domestic counterparts of GCHQ). On one recent occasion a phone call from a journalist to a member of the Yorkshire NUM staff was interrupted by a police radio message about traffic, and in S.Wales on the 6th April a coach proprietor was asked by the police to reveal the destination of pickets 10 mins. after the union had phoned through their booking. Miners and union officials have responded to this by laying false trails - at one stage sending hundreds of police to a disused coal depot in Kent.

2) The use of infiltrators and agent provocateurs on picket lines. This has been done more or less routinely throughout the strike. On 9th April David Owen Chief Constable of N.Wales admitted using plainclothes officers at the Point of Ayr colliery and on 10th April Leon Brittan publicly defended the use of these tactics.

When 4000 pickets succeeded in getting to Babbington colliery on 9th April a number of police infiltrators (in NCB donkey jackets and NUM stickers) began throwing stones. When one of them was challenged he claimed to be from a "Doncaster pit" but was unable to name one. This sort of activity doesn't just give the fifth good excuses to nick people (for example by shouting "Push" and arresting those who do), but combined with trade union accusations that all picket line violence is the result of police provocation it ensures that the miners are confused as to what's really going on and so hesitant about doing whatever is necessary to make picketing effective.

3) The extensive use of snatch squads (aided by police infiltrators who've been known to "target" particular miners by attaching cloured stickers to them) to break up picket lines and grab "ring-leaders".

All of these things were made use of during the miners strikes of '72 and '74 and much of the blatant brutality that's been seen - miners being roped to railings, car windscreens being smashed with crow-bars, pickets being beaten up and interrogated about their political views, "saturation policing" in pit towns... It all pretty standard stuff wherever proletarians confront 'their' law and order.

What is new is:

1) The level of national coordination of the police. The idea that there is no national police force in Britain has always been a myth. And ever since the First World War (and probably before then) the State has maintained some sort of permanent organisation to coordinate the police and other state agencies during periods of social unrest. Presently its the Civil Contingencies Committee. Nevertheless, there is no doubt that this coordination has been tightened up in recent years.

In addition to this coordination at governmental level there have also been weekly meetings of the Chief Constables and regular briefings from the Home Office (known about by Fleet St. hacks but almost entirely kept out of the papers).

2) The restriction of movement of flying pickets which began in the second week of the strike when Yorkshire miners were turned back from Lancashire along the M62 and Kent miners were stopped at the Dartford tunnel on the way to Nottingham.

3) Although the use of snatch squads is nothing new, the sophistication of "disturbance control" techniques available to the police has been considerably extended since the '81 riots. Police in full riot gear (flame-proof clothing, helmets etc.) were quick to appear on the scene during the disturbances at the mass picket in Warrington last November and the 23 man Police Support Units used in the present strike carry riot equipment as standard issue. It also must be remembered that the police now have large stocks of CS gas and rubber bullets as well as water cannons to make use of if they think it appropriate.

The point is that the agencies of the State have noted the problems associated with large-scale struggles like the '72 & '74 miners strikes, '78 lorry drivers strike, 1980 steel strike, 1981 riots and so on, and have made suitable contingency plans. On the one hand there have been strategic economic preparations like ensuring large stock-piles of coal at power stations, and on the other the increasing organisational sophistication and "tooling up" of the police and other State bodies.

The Civil Contingencies Committee is one of the standing Cabinet committees set up to deal with the major areas of Government activity. It was set up as the National Security Committee by the Heath government in 1972 to replace the Home Office 'Emergencies Committee' which had proved ineffective during the '72 miners strike. Its brief was to redraw the national War Plan on the assumption that the main enemy would be internal, to cover full-scale 'state of emergency' situations (prolonged strikes by key workers, insurrections etc). This was accomplished by 1975, at which time the Committee was renamed and continued with its other task of making plans for 'contingencies' - covering everything short of a full scale Emergency - terrorism, hi-jacking, flood disasters, maintaining essential services during strikes etc.

It is serviced by the Civil Contingencies Unit within the Cabinet Office which sets up interdepartmental teams to plan coordination between ministries, police and military with regard to specific threats of strike action. (This includes coordinating intelligence as to strike plans). Assessments of the seriousness of the strike and suggestions for counter-measures are presented to the Emergencies Committee, a sub-committee of the Civil Contingencies Committee, which takes charge if the threat materialises. Then during the strike the Unit co-ordinates the activities of the different ministries, and if necessary the regional and county emergency committees.

The police equivalent of this last function is the National Reporting Centre based at New Scotland Yard. Not as some have thought a new body established specifically to 'get' the miners this time - it was the main control centre during the riots in '81. However the miners strike in '72 was instrumental in focussing ruling class attention on the need for reform along these lines. In November '73 Home Secretary Robert Carr announced that next time the police intended to 'stop the masses forming'. The police planned to set up regional 'intelligence units' co-ordinated by Scotland Yard." (Daily Telegraph 14/11/73 quoted in State Research 14). In fact this was... only achieved as part of the wide-ranging institutional reforms begun by Robert Mark in the mid-seventies, under a Labour Government.

Similarly the Police Support Units which have been in the front line of the control of picketing, were commissioned in 1974 – essentially, under the need to meet situations ‘before and after (nuclear) attack’. (Police Manual of Home Defence 1974). In other words as part of drawing up the ruling class War Plan against insurrection. As distinct from the SPGs which are permanent operational groups, the officers forming PSUs remain part of their division as regular officers, but available for call up when the need arises. Each of the 325 police divisions in Great Britain is required to have at least one PSU – an inspector, two or three sergeants and thirty officers. That’s 11,000 specially trained staff to act as the ‘foot soldiers’ (to the PSU shock troops) in public order situations.

The vast amount of money spent on the police operations (already the cost local authorities have to meet ten of millions of pounds which the Government has now agreed to pay 75% of) may be seen by many liberals and leftists as a waste of public money (irresponsible spending by a nationalised industry perhaps?). But for capitalism the pacification of the working class is always sound investment. The Hampshire constabulary chartered a Boeing 737 to fly 250 officers to the East Midlands, who else would have such lavish company transport laid on to take them to their place of work?

The flying pickets succeeded in 1972 because the government had no effective response to them short of bringing in troops to assist the police. The miners succeeded in forcing the government and NCB to withdraw closure plans in 1981 because they caught them unprepared for a strike. The government has been making plans ever since for what has been seen on both sides as an inevitable clash. Government and union plans were both geared to a strike this winter when the overtime ban had reduced coal stocks. The current strike wasn’t planned by either side. But the NCB and the government have had few problems adapting their plans to the situation. The NUM leadership was clearly afraid that if it didn’t take this opportunity for a near national strike under national direction as it presented itself, they risked not having a second chance.

The problem is that the miners seem to be using the same tactics as they have served them in the past and expecting them to still work. The fact that MacGregor hasn’t used the Industrial Relations Legislation to force the union to remove pickets or be savagely fined owes as much to his belief that the miners can be defeated without it as it does to his fear of a united class response.

The miners’ strategy about taking the struggle on to the offensive can be seen in the dependency on their radical national leadership. For example in the militancy at the mass picket of NUM headquarters on Apr 12th to pressure the executive meeting not to call a strike ballot. The police injuries that occurred happened when the pickets surged forward to shake hands with Mick McGahey. If that dependency is scarcely surprising given the way the strike developed from a series of local disputes – in several cases in opposition to regional NUM leaderships, it still illustrates the lack of confidence in their own strength felt by many of the strikers. Illustrated more crucially by the low percentages of strikers actively picketing in many areas.

On the other hand there are hopeful signs – the hundreds of miners demonstrating outside Lincoln Jail on May 5th demanding the release of 4 of their comrades from Kiverton Park colliery arrested on their way to a picket. The attempts to block motorway also showed a welcome break from traditional tactics which aside from causing disruption in itself could be extended to tie police resources down or even prevent the movement of police reinforcements.

So far there have been no attempts to break through police road blocks on the approaches to pits. As one Kent miner said to a plenipotentiary: “We shouldn’t be in coaches, we should be driving those bloody great articulated lorries”. All that’s happened so far is that miners have taken up “cross-country running” by parking coaches several miles from the pits. Nor have there been attempts to disable police control vans (or any other aspect of police communications), or develop tactics for dealing with snatch squads.

As with all other aspects of the struggle tactics must turn from defence to offence. Failing to stop coal moving can’t be compensated by trying to generate public sympathy about the attack on the right to legally picket. Nor by relying on inter-union deals to limit scabbing, particularly in face of the NCBs advance planning to route imports through non-union ports. The battle against capitalist law ‘n’ order – at the immediate level the police is one that should unite the whole working class. We should all be looking for ways to stretch the blue line as thinly as possible.
TIED UP IN NOTTS

The divisions between areas and pits in the current dispute are of course not as hard and fast as is being portrayed. From the first days of the strike, many miners in the Nottinghamshire area — supposedly solidly anti-strike — came out in support of actions in other coalfields. At the same time some pits in “union loyalist” areas have drifted back to work, often because their loyalty has been strained by closures which the NUM was not ready to fight in the past. But the fact remains that the government/NCB strategy has succeeded in softening up some areas and causing — on an immediate level — a division of interest between coalfields.

Up until now, closures of unprofitable pits have affected just about every coalfield in the country except North and South Notts. Nottinghamshire miners earn the highest bonuses in the industry, thanks to the incentive scheme introduced under Tony Benn in 1977, even though they’ve also seen these bonuses reduced in the last couple of years. Sensing that the majority opinion amongst their members would be against strike action, the officials in Notts, and other “soft” areas such as Leicestershire, naturally thought that in terms of their career interests a local ballot was the safest option. It could justify their inaction before those miners solidly out on strike. Once the decision to ballot was made, the NCB and government concentrated on bribing some areas to ensure a big anti-strike majority.

The board sent out a special edition of its monthly newspaper, ‘Coal News’, setting out the lump sums miners could expect for being made redundant. This ‘offer’ ranges from £5,217 for a 21-year old to £36,480 for a man aged 49, assuming average weekly earnings of £165. The government obviously realises that it will cost more to break unionism in the mines than the cut rate price of £1,000 per head at GCHQ!

After the area ballots, the NCB kept piling on the incentives to carry on working. During the overtime ban, maintenance work was undertaken on the Monday morning, so miners would be sent home on Mondays and lose a day’s pay. Now, as an incentive to cross pit line, miners in Notts and other areas are being invited to spend Monday morning drinking tea in the canteen, and receive their productivity bonus as well as their basic pay.

Also, whereas before the strike, miners would receive an official warning if they left work 15 minutes early, now the management is inviting them to quit the coalface half an hour before their shift ends.

Production is well down in the areas where pits continue working. For example, at Cotgrave in South Notts, output is down by about 20,000 tons a week. But the object of the exercise is to break the unity of the miners, and so production bonuses are not only being paid, but have been restored to the levels in operation before the overtime ban.

The media has of course done all it can to inflame local chauvinisms, by reporting the great picket line spectacles in terms of militant Yorkshire pickets versus moderate Notts. miners. Unfortunately this does correspond in some measure to the traditional reality in the NUM. Notts. has always been a problem for the NUM since the days of the Spencer union after the General Strike. The Yorkshire miners descended on Nottinghamshire early on in the 1969 and 1972 disputes. On this occasion, it would have been wiser for threatened miners to argue their case in Nottinghamshire at a rank and file level, and develop solidarity before contemplating strike action. Instead, ‘Scar-gill’s Army’, organised and co-ordinated by the Yorks. NUM, turned up hoping to shame Notts. miners into supporting them out of a ‘traditional loyalty to the union’. When this failed, the strikers had no choice but to try to picket out the scabs — although it was still by no means inevitable that attitudes should harden to the extent they have. Some of the acts of revenge (vandalism, threats to families, etc.), have been tacitly to say the least. But with resources under the control of the union, and a massive police presence, real contact became increasingly difficult.

The conduct of the strike in these areas has therefore been left to small and isolated strike committees. While we admire the stand made by these isolated groups, it must be said that in many respects their ingrained trade union outlook is only making things more difficult. Specifically, it is a mistake for them to think the main effort needs to be winning over dubs and drabs of waveringers, those miners who are only working because everyone else is.

Most of the miners’ resources have been tied up in the concentrated effort to get Nottinghamshire out on strike. The secretary of the Notts. strike committee is reported as saying that once they can get out those miners still going to work, “the broader trade union movement can really throw its weight behind us”. But this ‘trench warfare’ view of the struggle is unrealistic, for the simple reason that the miners must make rapid headway or starve — only the bosses can afford a drawn-out strike. With the resources they have at their disposal, the government and coal board are proving that they can tempt many miners across the picket lines. In these circumstances, which may mean compelling other groups of workers to stop work, the miners need big successes. These would show that the strikers have the ability as well as the will to win, and perhaps bring a greater unity — not vice versa. But this, of course, is not the way the NUM wants to conduct the strike.

ABOUT US

Playtime is intended as a forum for discussing the reality of class struggle. If you have something to contribute — news, feedback, accounts of class struggle, articles, illustrations, whatever, we’d like to hear from you. There is no editorial line — but that doesn’t mean we don’t know what we disagree with. Individual articles reflect the thoughts, fantasies and inadequacies of their authors (in no particular order).

We especially welcome accounts of class struggle by participants, or people with a closer perspective than we have. We won’t change things without consulting you, but we may add an introduction to fill in background. We’d obviously prefer to do that with you so means of contacting you easily would be useful.

We don’t guarantee to publish stuff sent to us but we won’t change things (Beyond adding or subtracting spelling mistakes, subheads and illustrations) without consulting you. (We may cut letters but we will indicate we have done so). If we disagree we may publish a response alongside it.

In the outrage over the Government ‘disenfranchising’ the white collar secret police auxiliaries at GCHQ one official secret remained a mystery — why on earth had they done it? Theories about American pressure probably had a grain of truth, but seemed unlikely as the only explanation (quite apart from being obvious products of rabid left nationalism). Talk about this being the thin end of the wedge in de-unionising the civil service and the public sector were obvious nonsense. The government didn’t merely fail to make political capital out of the affair along these lines, it bent over backwards to insist it was untrue. Their actions throughout were hardly those of a body taking the first step in a co-ordinated campaign.

A more convincing explanation was given to a playmate — by a CPSA union bureaucrat. Apparently the Government had been anxious to counter civil service disaffection over low pay in institutions like GCHQ — the importance of keeping the loyalty of a crucial part of their planning for war was obvious. They decided they would do this by raising their wages significantly. However, since they had no intention of extending this benefit to those state employees merely engaged in servicing British capitalism this meant separating the GCHQ workers from national negotiating machinery. Far from wishing to de-unionise them the government wanted them to have their own union in the form of a staff association, which would then negotiate the pay rises. So much for theory — the Foreign Office then proceeded to comprehensively bollocks the whole thing up, assisted by some ‘banana-skin’ sabotage by First Division civil servants (the only effective industrial action during the whole affair).

If this is true it will be interesting to see how long they wait for the dust to settle before instituting the second half of the plan. It is in any case interesting to note that while this explanation was believed to be true by the leaderships of all the unions involved, not a word emerged about it in all the verbiage about the ‘attack on our democratic rights’.

MUNICIPAL ANARCHY?

Your absolute dedication to politics and socialism is an almost religious belief in what you’re doing.

Well, although I’m as agnostic in my own politics as any other people’s idea of religion, I am not one of those people who believe in scientific Marxism. I’m a non-vocate because I believe the activities of the Left are aimless, a running society, and then that secularism is a harmless and more practical act of faith. There are too many loose ends of thought in me to find a convenient label, but I suppose I’m an anarchist-viable.

I’m willing to break the law—Livingstone

Mr Livingstone, speaking on LBC, said the Government’s actions reminded him of the slogan often scrawled about London — “if voting changed anything they would abolish it.”

“The Government has done exactly that,” he said.

INTRODUCTION

In recent years, the vogue for austerity has spread through the predominantly ‘socialist’ governments of Western Europe. All were elected on the promise of creating jobs (as was the Conservative government here in 1979, in fact), at a time when inflation was high. In other words, a time when labour costs could be absorbed by price rises more easily, since inflation was around 15% and increasing, not 5% and stable.

Now the inflation rate is falling due to general crisis conditions — the falling real price of raw materials through a world surplus of commodities. Overproduction has meant lower prices set against higher labour costs, resulting in lay-offs and unemployment. But it has also provoked a more direct attack on wages. Austerity preached by governments is to keep wage increases below the level of inflation. This attack, either through legislation or more indirect government ‘guidelines’, is more likely to provoke — or at least provide a focus for — workers resistance, than the ‘natural’ erosion of wages by inflation.

Militancy has materialised, notably in Belgium and Italy. In Belgium, a uniform wage cut across the whole public sector, made in the “national interest”, resulted in a general strike last September, and another in April. The falling rate of inflation in Italy has made it necessary to attack the ‘Secla Mobile’, the mechanism by which wages are related to the rise in inflation, and has provoked large-scale struggles last winter and this autumn.

After a short period of industrial expansion, the French government introduced a 1% cut for all workers — justified as being necessary to preserve social services and social security (“solidarity with the unemployed”, comrades). This strategy has struck a chord with Neil Kinnock in this country, remarking that he was sure no one would object to paying more taxes to defend the NHS. The new wave socialist leadership in Britain and France, as well as those in Spain and Portugal, are busily redefining socialism away from the idea of ‘equality’, which can only mean equality of sacrifice (as espoused by Callaghan in 1976). They are rediscovering the notion of ‘Freedom’ in order to justify centralised state action, and the perpetuation of inequalities which socialism has meant in every country in the world.

---

West Germany, the country where wage restrictions are eagerly accepted by the unions, is also in the middle of a strike wave. Here, the struggle against austerity in its stark form has been diverted into a demand for a 35 hour week. The unions see this as a forward-looking, positive demand to create more jobs and a better standard of life for those already working. But for the rank-and-file, it has taken on the form of wage militancy, little known in West Germany. As one striker put it: “For 30 years the workers in this country have been good boys. Now there are profits around, and more to come with automation. It’s our turn to cash in.” As profits have risen, real wages have fallen, but a more equal distribution of what the unions hope will be ever-increasing profits is hardly ‘cash in’.

Britain waged the opium wars (1839-42 and 1856-60) to force Manchu China to accept the import of opium, cede territory such as Hong Kong, and open the country to imperialist domination. Now a new opium war is being fought against the working class in Britain and Ireland.

The CIA's contribution to heroin production in Indo-China is well documented. They tried to build up political support with wholesale purchases of the opium crop from local tribespeople. The product was refined, and then, it has been alleged, distributed amongst America's youth in the attempt to weaken the anti-war movement. Those who died from the drug were perhaps just as much victims of the war as the soldiers and civilians who died in Vietnam itself.

As with many other commodities, there is a world glut on the heroin market. But this is only allowing the dealers to invest in our misery - distributing the drug on the cheap, in order to reap the rich rewards of addiction and rising prices in the future. In Pakistan, the government has clamped down on internal consumption, forcing producers to off-load it elsewhere. There can be no doubt that heroin sales are helping finance the anti-soviet resistance over the border in Afghanistan.

Easy availability and low prices are having a devastating impact on some working class housing estates. In North-South, London, there are 40 or more dealers and over 1000 regular users; in Liverpool it has been reported that half of all 14-25 year-olds on some estates have used heroin. From the perspective of middle class liberalism this is just another "inner city problem". But this only disguises the effect of heroin addiction in suppressing the most desperate section of the working class.

Addiction is not an "aberration" from the norm of capitalist society, but an extension of one of its more important features. Capitalism nurtures compulsive consumption in all our spheres of activity. Virtually all the goods and materials we need to live are available only as commodities, as objects to be bought. All "businesses" must maximise their sales in a market where all commodities are competing for our attention. Obviously, advertising and sales pitch play a major part in this process, but people often internalise it: the compulsion to buy can spring from our attempt to overcome lack of personal fulfilment: in our alienated existence, we substitute the act of "having" or "possessing" for "doing" or "being". "Keeping up with the Joneses" is not just a matter of social status; more often, we genuinely convince ourselves that life really would be different with the latest gadget, nick-nack or gimmick. Drugs take commodity fetishism one stage further, with physical addiction: it becomes impossible for our bodies to function without a particular commodity. Heroin is the supreme commodity, monopolising the user's physical and mental needs.

Buying the drug as "skag" or "smack", many users are at first unaware that it is heroin, partly because heroin is popularly known as a drug that is injected, whereas skag is inhaled. Usage is less detectable, it gives a greater high than glue and does not leave visible sores, or the characteristic needle marks of the junkie. Users often only find out that it is H, and how addictive it is, when they try to kick the habit.

In the words of William Burroughs, "Junk is the ideal product... the ultimate merchandise. No sales talk necessary. The client will crawl through a sewer and beg to buy... The junk merchant does not sell his product to the consumer, he sells the consumer to his product." Beyond a certain level of addiction, there is no limit or control. Drug sickness is to lie, cheat, inform, do anything to satisfy the craving. The "public concern" about working class youth on drugs is not essentially over their addiction, but rather over the robbery, mugging and prostitution that supports the habit.

The pyramid of junk is the pyramid of consumer society, one level eating the level below, those at the top always fatter than those at the bottom - the addicts are always given away by their emaciated looks. Those who remain at the bottom are forced to steal to keep up their habit, generally from fellow proletarians. Other users become pushers to make the money to satisfy their need. As such they must find more customers to survive, and the capitalist ethos is reproduced in the drugs underworld. Selling becomes more of a habit than using.

Unemployed youths are able to see through many of the illusions which help others to get by from day to day. They know the system has nothing to offer them. They are taking the brunt of the crisis. The choice is stark: fighting back or escapism. When the opportunities for fighting back - such as during the riots of 1981 - are limited, or not realised, escapism, particularly through drugs, becomes more frequent. At the same time, the corrosive influence of heroin undermines the personality. It acts to quell revolt before it takes place.

Groups have emerged to combat the heroin pushers on some estates where addiction is widespread. Sometimes they take openly reactionary positions, such as calling for more policing. But in other cases, where the groups show a greater... sensitivity to the complexity of the problem, they themselves came up against the forces of the state.

In Dublin, where surveys of some working class areas have shown that over 50% of 12 to 16-year-olds have at some time been offered heroin, Corporation tenants have got together to drive pushers off the estates. Direct action (threats, attacks) has been employed with such success that it has set off a moral backlash amongst the petty criminal fraternity/sorority. One group, calling itself “Concerned Criminals” (what next – the “Festival of Light Fingers”?) complained that the Concerned Parents’ campaign against the pushers is also having a drastic impact on their own living standards.

Initially, the police did not react to these events. But as the campaign gathered in momentum, the filth decided it was time to reestablish “order”. They called for the disbandment of the vigilante groups, claiming that they were better able to deal with the problem.

But “deal” is the right word. Wherever drug pushing is profitable, the police get in on the racket somewhere along the line. By recycling drugs seized in raids, drug squad and customs officers can top up their wages. The police allow pushers freedom to pursue their vile business in exchange for tip-offs (which means prison for many forced into crime and other proletarians who are in the wrong place at the wrong time). Junkies too are notorious sources of police information. Further up the criminal hierarchy, police involvement in the rackets keeps them informed on what is going on; in exchange for a piece of the action, the police protect their criminal concessionaires by launching the occasional anti-drugs campaign to wipe out any competition arriving on the scene. The sanction of arrest allows them to make sure that the drugs market runs smoothly and profitably.

The impact of the anti-heroine campaign on organised crime has been a defeat for the police. But it has also attracted attention from less obvious, but therefore more insidious, enemies of the proletariat. Firstly, left-wing politicians and their soft-cop shock troops in the social services departments, are ready to exploit this opportunity to draw the tenants into the mainstream of democratic politics. The aim of these people is, in the words of the New Statesman, to ensure that proletarians’ anger and rediscovered sense of power is safely “channelled into effective political action on broader issues”. The “inner city” is allowed to fight back, but only through the mercenaries in town halls and parliament, and in the housing and civil rights pressure groups.

Secondly, there is the danger that the IRA, who already have a foothold in the estates through local Sinn Fein activists, may exploit the situation to establish in Dublin what they have already achieved in Derry and West Belfast: a terrorist protection racket that sustains its community support through a pseudo-opposition to the prevailing social order, but is in reality no better than the police and the rest of gangsterism. Already the IRA has intervened with a botched attempt to retaliate against a gang attack on tenant activists. The Provos are on the look out for a cause that will help them build up support in the Republic, and give weight to their claim to be a movement of consequence throughout the 32 counties.

In Southwark, the story has been a bit different. Some local tenants made the mistake of inviting local MP, Simon Hughes, to give their campaign early media coverage and acceptability. In Dublin, MP Tony Gregory only muscled in on the act after the tenants had already made visible successes. But in Southwark they soon got an insight into what liberal “community politics” means. Their meeting was swamped with Hughes’ entourage of Police, social workers and other experts in distortion, who attempted to take over the meeting, and ram home the message that only institutional reforms (from better policing to more addiction centres) could solve the problem.

Although angry tenants challenged this arrogant imposition of authority, by reinforcing a sense of dependence and helplessness, Hughes and co. had helped sabotage the practical tasks that the problem requires. (Dublin beware – we need vigilance against the bureaucrats as well as the pushers!).

The “drug problem” will only be tackled to the extent that proletarians challenge and fight back against the society that exploits and undermines them. This means self assertion and autonomous action. There can be no collaboration with the class enemy in any of its guises. There can be no faith in political or economic “remedies”. Along with our self assertion as individuals and in groups, we have to develop our sense of class solidarity. This means, for example, that we must overcome the structural efforts to divide us and set us one against the other through the very architecture of our slum estates. We must develop a community that is resilient to the despair and demoralisation which is daily driven into our heads by both our living conditions and the media. Such a community needs no “leaders” who tie up our efforts with the soft end of the state, who mediate between us and the politicians and cops. This has been achieved in the past and can be recreated. In Soweto, in 1976, young black recognised the social role of the drinking clubs and burnt them down. Like the “Concerned Parents” of Dublin, theirs was no puritan zeal, but the realisation of how drugs, whether “legal” or “illegal” are used to repress the proletariat.
Austerity programmes, of whatever national variety, are creating an attitude of wage militancy throughout the European working class. But this militancy is by and large only an attempt to keep wages in line with inflation. More depressing is the engineered fear of 'pricing oneself out of a job', and the resulting acceptance of actual pay cuts or productivity-linked deals on pay and hours.

Examples of class resistance to austerity and unemployment can be found in most countries in Western Europe, as indeed they can be found throughout the world — India, Bolivia, Tunisia. But the unions have tried to separate the two aspects of the struggle against job losses on the one hand, against wage cuts on the other. Under their guiding hand, opposition has been channelled into Days of Action, which far from demonstrating their ability to 'mobilise' the working class in displays of unity, have been shows of weakness, several steps removed from strike action. Increasingly intimidated by unions in Britain, these Days of Action are a continental speciality, having a great attraction for trade unions wanting to 'organise' opposition in countries where union strength itself is not so great, enabling them to bask in the reflected glory of large demonstrations.

During the recession it has been easier for unions to muster support for token activities like this.

Unions generally behave more confidently when conducting disputes over pay than when jobs are at issue. A call to wage militancy is likely to meet with a greater unity of response, since it usually applies to whole sections of workers, than a call to fight redundancies, especially when it is only some people's jobs that are at risk. But when workers are affected by both austerity measures and redundancies, the token stoppages organised by the unions are often escalated by the workers into a more active mode of struggle — for example, the riots in Belgium, the intensification and extension of the strikes in Asturias, and the go-no areas in Lorraine (which were ended in order to let the unions organise their ineffectual march on Paris). The indications for the struggle of the working class throughout Europe are becoming clearer. Only by unifying the struggle against austerity in all its aspects can defeat be avoided.

Renewed attacks on workers' wages by the Italian government have led to a resurgence of class struggle in recent months.

During January and February there were long negotiations between the 5-party coalition government* and the three union confederations' over various economic measures, including the cutting of the 'Scala Mobile', a mechanism which partially protects wages from inflation through automatic increases every 3 months, linked to but less than the rate of inflation. CGIL, CISL and UIL union leaders were all prepared to accept substantial cuts in the Scala Mobile, as they had done the previous winter.

On February 8th - while the negotiations were still going on — a near-general strike broke out in Milan against the proposed reduction. Union leaders expressed concern at the "anti-union tone" of the 30,000 strong workers demonstration. In mid-February, the negotiations finally broke down. The CISL and UIL leaders were agreeable to the government's proposals, but the CGIL was split between a minority of Socialist Party leaders who wanted acceptance, and the Communist Party majority faction who were disturbed at the extent to which workers were taking things into their own hands.

The government decided to go ahead and impose the cut by means of a 'decree', which would become effective immediately and last for just 2 months (without any law being passed through parliament).

In response, hundreds of strikes broke out all over Italy on 15th February. Railway lines and roads were blocked in several places, and in Pozzuoli, near Naples, workers stormed and ransacked the CISL's offices. Over the next few weeks there was a series of disruptions, including local general strikes, blockades, rolling 24-hour strikes and demonstrations involving tens of thousands (mostly workers) in most big cities. On March 8th, there was a general strike in Turin: the 80,000-strong demo was the biggest the city had seen for more than 30 years.

On February 22nd the CGIL/CISL/UIL United Federation of Transport Unions issued a statement that strikes in the railways must be conducted according to the trade unions' code of conduct, and on March 7th, government minister Spadolini said that behind the strikes lurked "the danger of a return to a destabilising form of extremism", and that there was the risk of all forms of self-regulation of strikes disappearing.

Some of the strikes have been organised through workplace assemblies, but most have been organised by the 'Factory Councils'. These are bodies of representatives elected by all the workers in a workplace (irrespective of union membership), which came into being as a means of co-ordinating struggles during the waves of unofficial strikes in Italy in the late '60s (in particular, the 'Hot Autumn' of 1969).

As with all organisations established in the course of struggle, the FCs degenerated pretty rapidly when there was no longer any large-scale struggle for them to relate to. This happened to the extent that before the present wave of struggle the FCs had been involved in virtually nothing except minor chores like organising works outings. However much these organisations might get up the noses of union bureaucrats, the fact that workers have chosen to conduct their fight through pre-existing institutions will put definite limits on how far it can develop. For a start, they take a form which automatically excludes non-employed sections of the working class (even though the class struggle in Italy has often produced joint assemblies of workers and other proletarians such as housewives and the unemployed.) Secondly, meetings of FC delegates will tend to act as democratic structures in which the initiatives of delegates from the more militant departments/workplaces will be suffocated by the passivity of those from the less militant areas (exactly as happens in an ordinary union set-up).

However, the FCs were by no means the only game in town. Many strikes took on a classic 'wildcat' character, with striking workers marching to other workplaces to demand solidarity action.

On the 27th February there was a meeting of the Milan FCs. Some wanted a general strike, but the majority opted for a 3-hour strike and a national demo in Rome. The leftist daily il Manifesto took this as indicating that there had not been a serious break with the unions, and the next day the CGIL boss and CP heavy Lama warned that the FCs must not come into conflict with the TU organisations.

On March 6th the first ever national assembly of FCs took place, with 6000 representatives from all over Italy. Strong criticism was made of the authoritarian practices of the union leaders, but unionism itself was not attacked and a document was approved calling for democratic unions controlled from the base. A national demo was fixed for the 24th, in Rome.

The next day, the CGIL leadership announced its support for the demo, in opposition to the CISL and UIL. The meaning of this gesture was clearly spelt out in the right-wing daily Resto del Carlino, which said that it was better for the Communist Party's Lama to take control of the strike - to prevent extremist elements becoming too strong. The degree to which the CGIL succeeded in assuming control is seen by the fact that they and the CP were able to force a postponement by 10 days (until April 10th) of the next national assembly of FCs, called to discuss the possibility of organising a general strike if the decree to cut the Scala Mobile was not rescinded.

In the end, the 2,500 representatives decided that if the government were to renew the decree after it expired on 16th April, the 18th would be a national day of struggle (not a general national strike, but a series of regional ones.) As it turned out, the decree was not made law, but was extended to the end of June, after which the Scala Mobile would operate as it did before the February cut-back. This took the heat out of things enough to prevent the 'Day of Action' from taking place, although there was a widespread part-day strike in Milan the following day.

As the strikes raged, the Italian bourgeois press carried hysterical articles about how the 'autoconvocati' - literally, the 'self-convenors' - were indulging in mob-rule and were fascist provocationists. At the same time, union leaders expressed horror as some workers publicly burned their union cards and struck without warning.

Workers displayed a high degree of unofficial militancy, but this does not automatically mean the strike movement represented any real break with the unions and left parties. To a large extent, the CP/CGIL was able to manipulate the movement simply by putting on a more militant face - this, despite the years of the 'Historic Compromise', during which the CP openly supported the Christian Democrat government's attacks on the working class. When Lama spoke at the 26th March demo in Rome, which was attended by 500,000 people, saying that the CGIL was the only union not manipulated by the Socialist Party government, it was the first time in years that he had been able to speak to a workers rally without being physically attacked. This can be contrasted with the 'silent general strike' of last winter, when the union leaders dared not announce the deal they were about to make with the employers.

At the time of writing, the socialist government is trying to make the decree permanent as quickly as possible. The Communist Party, having done everything they can to divert the struggle away from the streets and workplaces, and into parliament, are now putting on the greatest display of parliamentary opposition seen from these cringing apparatchiks for many years. After all, the workers have paid good money to see the clowns perform.

*This is led by prime minister Craxi of the Socialist Party, although the largest party is the Christian Democrats, who always retained a clear majority in the period 1965-77, and subsequently ruled with the help of the Communist Party.

†CGIL, CISL and UIL. Most Italian workers are organised in unions according to nominal political/religious affiliations. The CGIL is for CP'ers and Socialists, the CISL for Catholics and the UIL for Socialists, Republicans and Social Democrats. The level of unionisation is comparable with Britain (i.e. about half of all employed workers.)

SPAIN

Spain has been experiencing a series of disputes in the greatest unrest since the strikes of 1976 which greeted the death of Franco.

Official statistics for the first 3 months of this year gave 488 strikes involving 1,4m workers, and a loss of 22m working hours. Most of the action has been directed against state-owned industries - public transport, the petroli industry, schools, steel, mining, shipbuilding and construction. In Asturias, a 2-day strike called by the mining union over pit closures (unreported in the press here, surprise surprise) was turned into a confrontation by miners extending the action beyond the limits set by the union. Riots continued after the 2-day strike and involved workers from other industries in the region.

The industrial action is against a socialist government elected on the promise of creating 800,000 jobs, and now presiding over 2.5m unemployment - the highest rate in Europe at 19%. The government is pursing a policy similar to those of the French and Italian governments; austerity and modernisation. The unions are being urged to moderate wage claims of 8-10% (in line with inflation), to the government target of 6.5%. Industrial cutbacks are planned, for instance the closure of pits and steel plants, with the loss of 60,000 jobs. The government is looking to scrap the job security workers had under Franco, in compensation for their trade union rights being abolished. Now trade unions are being encouraged, the price is unemployment for the workers.
FRANCE

At least 200,000 more jobs will go as Mitterand’s socialist government presses on with its restructuring of French industry. Finance minister Delors, in line to become the new Prime Minister, has forecast more austerity in the run-up to the 1986 election. Deflation and fiercer competition are to be pursued. Government expenditure is to be cut as a sweeter for the bosses, behind the rhetoric of encouraging industrial investment.

Workers have responded with a number of strikes in the public sector and heavy industry. Against a background of 9% inflation, a 3% pay limit affecting 9m. workers (4.5m civil servants, 2.5m on indexed-linked pensions and 2m in the public sector), has been greeted by a one-day strike involving hospitals, schools, post, power, transport and the civil service. Redundancies announced in the car, steel and mining industries have been met with strikes and demonstrations. This response is under the control of the unions – specifically, the CGT, whose Communist Party sponsors continue to hold their seats in the government, from where they denounce austerity and the redundancies. On the outside, the unions are abetting the measures by limiting and separating struggles over pay and jobs. The ruling Socialists Union, the CFDT, has denounced as “irrelevant and harmful” the one-day public sector strike, when 30,000 marched in Paris. Marie leader of the CFDT, refused to support opposition to the government, claiming the strike was by “privileged workers” wanting to keep up their purchasing power at the expense of others. The CFDT instead emphasises the government’s efforts to create more jobs, which they say would be jeopardised by workers making irresponsible pay demands.

After the violent confrontation at Talbot (see WP March ’84), when the CGT was in the forefront of resisting (i.e. negotiating and helping to implement) redundancies, the CGT has wrested back the initiative from other unions and from the workers in the steel and car industries. Their action has been described by Marie as “leading unionism towards suicide” (if only)! His role as Samaritan, talking over problems with the government, has led him to claim that the “real battle” is for “meaningful leisure”, where shorter hours will be paid for by higher productivity and a drop in real pay. This reflects Mitterand’s recent claim that the emphasis of his policy is less on economic benefits than on ‘social reform’.

These reforms were soon to be enjoyed by the steel workers, whose “economic benefit” consisted of 25,000 redundancies (1 in 4 of the workforce). They responded by implementing their own brand of social reforms — attacking local branches of the Socialist Party and CFDT, rioting, blocking roads with burning barricades and tearing up railway lines.

The restructuring of heavy industry entails 60,000 redundancies in the steel, coal and shipbuilding industries over the next 5 years. The brunt of the steel redundancies will be borne in Lorraine, which is to lose 20,000 jobs out of a total of 93,000. This is on top of 3 previous redundancy schemes in the last 7 years, which took out 48,000 jobs. 100,000 workers demonstrated, or rather rioted, in Paris, This time, a restrained 30,000 were marshalled by the unions in hopes of a better deal from a socialist government.

The government’s strategy has been to take on one group of workers at a time in each area. 2 months before the redundancies were announced in steel, 28,000 were proposed in coal mining. The north of France was to suffer most. Lorrain, in the north-west, would escape lightly. Thus, the miners were taken on in areas where the steel workers were least affected, and vice versa, limiting the potential for joint resistance among workers in the two industries and regions.

Mitterand came to power promising an expansion of heavy industry, and is now running it down in such the same way that Wilson’s labour government did in Britain in the 60s. Mitterand’s white heat of technology would raise coal production from 24 to 30m tonnes by 1990. The reality is a projected decline to 17m tonnes this year, and 12m by 1988. France has the legacy of Giscard D’Estaing’s fetish for nuclear power, and the government has secured alternative energy supplies in the form of gas from Russia and Algeria. In addition, 9m tonnes of high-grade coal is being imported, while low-grade French coal, surplus to requirement, is costing Fr 750 per tonne to produce, and selling at Fr 450. A dozen pits are to close with the loss of 30,000 of the remaining 57,000 jobs.

Steel was to be expanded in the same way. Two firms were nationalised and given large investment subsidies. They continued to make vast losses, and production has had to be cut in line with EEC quotas. The EEC has also directed that all subsidies must stop. The left and CP have simply advocated protectionism, devolution and a continuation of subsidies to cushion the immediate effects of the crisis.

With the CP employment minister predicting an increase in unemployment by 350,000 to 2.6m by the end of the year, the government has promised that the restructuring will not put more on the dole queues. It has devised a two-year retraining scheme on 70% pay for 15,000 steel workers, Lorraine being one of 14 ‘restructuring centres’ for new industry, with a £43m investment programme to the Electricity board and the CFDT, whose deputy general secretary Chereque — leader of steel strikes in the past — has accepted a government post to implement the programme, buying out workers in an official capacity.

The irony of promising Renault to Lorraine was highlighted a few weeks later, when the government turned its restructuring attention to the car industry. A strike and occupation at the Citroen plant outside Paris, in protest at 1,300 redundancies there (part of 6,000 in the Peugeot/Talbot group, which includes Citroen), coincided with the government’s announcement that the state-owned Renault would shed 7,250 workers. The unions have been at pains to take up each strike as it comes, and drop it when the next one occurs, fostering disillusionment among workers by their willingness to enter into negotiations with the government. Both the CGT and CFDT have supported the strike at Citroen; the CFDT in line with its argument that Citroen should stop manufacturing in Spain, and import jobs rather than cars; the CFDT in order to press for better compensation and retraining. Or even shorter working hours, if the German dispute gains a hold on workers’ imaginations.
West Germany is experiencing its first big strike wave since 1978, when a 6-week strike for shorter hours ended in collapse. Print and engineering workers are in dispute over a union-formulated demand for a 35-hour week. With the biggest union - IG Metall - claiming they have 14 weeks' funds for strike pay, the strike could compare with those of 1957, when workers were out for 4 months for better sick pay.

The unions did everything they could to avoid a mass strike. IG Metall claims that a 35-hour week will create 1.4m jobs. The employers have countered that it will increase production costs by 18%. As they put it, "A four-week strike is preferable to a one minute cut in working hours." Both sides are publically ignoring the probability of speed-ups - 40 hours' work compressed into 35. This would raise profitability, and meet with the government's approval; it has taken the stance that to move out of recession, the workers need to work harder, not less hours.

With neither side admitting the implications of a faster working week, and both sticking to their 'principles', negotiations had been going on since December. The first industrial action did not take place until March. It was limited to demos and token disruption, such as turning up to work 2 hours late. The employers took little notice, and after 3 weeks of thinly-spread actions involving just 30,000 engineering workers (out of a total union membership of 2.6 million) in the car, steel and electrical industries, the union called off the stoppages. It thought concessions could be got from the employers, who were offering 3.3% on pay, flexible working hours and retirement at 58 (based on a government initiative to thwart the 35-hour demand, by offering a 35% subsidy to employers on the cost of filling the resulting vacancies). IG-Metall had not pushed a pay claim for the current round, preferring to concentrate on hours; now it was getting cold feet.

IG-Metall was the prime sponsor of a 35-hour demand, not because it was the most militant union, but because it is West Germany's biggest. 6 other unions were involved, and 200,000 workers had taken action. IG-Metall's membership was opposed to the calling-off of the strikes, but the union trotted out the usual argument to dampen militancy: "We could be facing the biggest defeat for organised labour for many years." The union was quite happy to lead the workers to defeat without a fight.

It was workers in the militant print union IG-Druck who stepped up the tempo with a series of wildcat strikes and disruption in the national and provincial press. Because of pressure from the regions, IG-Metall convened a special delegate conference, which voted for a strike ballot. A week later, the union executive announced that this would be held in a further weeks' time, thus cutting out a 3-week cooling-off period since the previous strikes. Opinion polls showed only 30% in favour of a strike. Since 75% would be required, the union hoped that matters would be left at peaceable negotiation. Also, ballots would be held in only 3 regions, and at different times, limiting the potential for a national strike movement. Other regions would merely stage supportive or token actions.

On May Day, a 100,000 strong rally indicated growing enthusiasm for a fight rather than tokenism. IG-Druck, with 145,000 members, called for an immediate strike on the papers. 20 were stopped and 25 disrupted. When the IG-Metall ballots came out in favour of a strike, the union called out 13,000 workers in selective strikes at 14 car component factories - emphasising all the while that this was a gentle application of pressure. There was to be no direct disruption of car plants; they only wanted to resume talks.

The employers responded with the threat of lock-outs if supplies of components dried up. BMW proposed a complete shutdown of 4 plants employing 30,000, and Audi 2 employing 17,500. Daimler-Benz, Porsche, Opel and Volkswagen (who threatened to close their plant in Belgium) took a similar stance. This escalated the dispute, and IG-Metall was obliged to call out 11,000 workers at Daimler after 20,000 had been laid off. This was the first action directly against car plants.

IG-Druck stepped up the action with newspapers and magazines disrupted in 150 plants. Workers in heavy industry in the Ruhr began stoppages. DAG - the white collar union - called for a national strike ballot. The banking and insurance union called a strike, and the trade union federation called on all 14 member unions to stage "sympathy stoppages" against the lock-outs.

As we go to press, 70,000 are laid off with 14,000 on strike in 19 component firms. The Federal Labour Office has refused to pay unemployment benefit to those locked out. A demonstration is planned in Bonn for May 28th, by which time all car production may have stopped.

The dispute has already cost £1 billion in lost car production. The government has called for new negotiations, saying that even a short strike will set back a West German economic recovery dependent on car exports. Now, the employers have said they will meet the unions without preconditions, going back on their previous refusal to discuss any cut in the working week.

Whether the workers stand to gain anything from this situation will depend not just on their willingness to take action, but on their ability to cut through the swathes of mystification in which both unions and bosses have been wrapping the real issues. Any 'victory' along the lines of a shorter working week could turn out to be worse than hollow, unless it is accompanied by fierce resistance to speed-ups and redundancies. French workers have already found this out: the 39-hour week introduced by the Mitterrand government, and hailed by the socialists as a blow against unemployment, has merely helped the bosses raise the rate of exploitation without touching the unemployment statistics at all.
LEBANON

OVER THEIR DEAD BODIES

An undisguised, but probably temporary, setback for the Western Bloc has taken place. The withdrawal of the 'Multinational Peacekeeping Forces' and collapse of the American-sponsored Lebanese army demonstrates, not so much the cleverness of Syrian policy - although the Syrians have been the main beneficiaries - as the failure of the Reagan administration to exploit an opportunity to solidify a united front against the dwindling Soviet Bloc proxies in the region.

However, America has made it clear that it is still the strongest superpower. Since passing the last benchmark in the present decline of the world capitalist system (the 1981-82 depression), the U.S. ruling class has succeeded in shunting the main burden of hardship elsewhere, sponsoring a 'recovery' at home whilst tightening its stranglehold on the world's debtor countries. The illusion of a vibrant domestic economy is essential to any American government wanting to secure public support for an advance against the (other) "Evil Empire".

In the Caribbean and Central America, Reagan foolishly overplayed a strong hand with his plan to mine Nicaraguan waters. But U.S. confidence is high with its establishment of a permanent military outpost in Honduras, the rearmament of Guatemala, the encirclement of Nicaragua, and last October's invasion of Grenada. The hope is that the passage of the Kissinger Report's recommendations - huge injections of military and economic aid - will neutralise the 'problem' for the moment. The Sandinistas and the El Salvador left have come to understand that the U.S. is no 'paper tiger', and are keen to avoid a direct confrontation. With their smiling stalinist faces, the ruling bureaucratic honchos of the FSLN and the FMLN are tightening the noose of state power around the neck of the proletariat, now that the task of building the gibbet of 'national liberation' is almost complete.

Meanwhile, Eastern Bloc ventures into Chad and Namibia by Soviet allies Libya and Angola/Mozambique have been checked by France and South Africa respectively. Moscow's influence in Iran - the Tudeh Party - is being physically liquidated as a reward for its fidelity to the Mullah regime.

The Russians are further bogged down in Afghanistan and Ethiopia, and seem unlikely to gain from the carnage of the Iran-Iraq war: both blocs are allowing the two states to slog it out, and so far have succeeded in 'containing' the conflict, whilst the cash registers of the world's arms dealers ring up another sale with every death.

But the biggest reverse for the Russian Bloc came with the sifting of NATO's new Pershing II and Cruise missiles, only minutes' flying time from the seat of Soviet power.

With the Soviet Union in retreat along a number of fronts, the West also holds the best hand in the Middle East. The 1982 Israeli invasion removed an erstwhile Russian ally from the area - the Palestine Liberation Organisation - leaving an estimated 12,000 civilians dead. Subsequent events left the PLO divided into pro-Western (Arafat) and pro-Eastern (Abu Saleh) factions. 'Moderate' (i.e. pro-Western) Arab powers - Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Jordan, Iraq and now the pro-Arafat PLO have been brought closer together. Egypt has been re-instated as a member of the Islamic Conference Organisation, and along with Jordan is eagerly awaiting massive shipments of modern U.S. armaments. With a little smooth power-brokerage (which is not Reagan's strong suit) this new Arab combine could reach a modus vivendi with Israel and shore up Western interests against Syria and Islamic irrationalist fundamentalism.

In the light of these favourable developments, the failure to sort out the Lebanon underscores the ineptness of American foreign policy when it comes to securing strategic compromises from its allies. Military options have been to the fore where political and economic inducements, like the Kissinger plan in Central America, should have been in the offing (with perhaps the Saudi treasury to foot the bill!) The American ruling class may yet opt for a more skilled diplomatic management in the White House in 1984 - after Carter's puffed-up moralism and Reagan's bluff and bluster, they must be looking for a new Tricky Dickie.

Let's outline some of the main events in the Mid-East in the past two years. In June 1982, with Alexander Haig at the helm of U.S. foreign policy, the Israeli army under the then defence secretary Ariel Sharon was given the green light to strike into Lebanon and knock out two Soviet allies, the PLO and the Syrians. This attempt to achieve a "strategic consensus" was initially successful: the Syrian air force and ground defences were wiped out; the PLO was pushed back to Beirut, bombarded for 30 days, and finally forced to evacuate from Lebanon by sea. The first contingent of U.S. marines was sent into Beirut during August 1982 to supervise the removal of the Palestinian militias.

The political supremacy of the pro-Western Christian Maronite Phalange party, centred on the Gemayel clan, was assured by Israeli force of arms.

On September 1st, Reagan announced a plan to implement what then seemed possible: a political state for Arafat and Co., in conjunction with Jordan, on the West Bank and in Gaza. Yasser Arafat himself travelled to Amman to confer with Jordan's King Hussein — the author of the Black September massacre of 1970 when he turned his Bedouin troops on Palestinian refugee camps in the West Bank. Arafat seemed to be cozying up to the idea of a Western-sponsored solution to the 'Palestine Question'. This was against the stated wishes of both the PLO executive and the Arab League resolution on Palestine.

But newly-elected Lebanese President Bashir Gemayel, the chief of the Maronite militia, was assassinated and replaced by his more urban and less ruthless brother Amin. Several days later 900 Palestinian civilians were slaughtered in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps by Israeli-sponsored Christian troops under Saad Haddad. The Marines were sent back to Beirut in late September '82, ostensibly as a "peace-keeping" force. Troops from other Western bloc countries — Italy, France and Britain — were duly added. But at this stage, only a massive army of occupation could have imposed a pax americana on Lebanon. As it was, the Americans tried to build up Gemayel's power in and around Beirut. But they failed to pull off the political initiative that might have compensated for Gemayel's inability to present himself as anything other than a purely factional leader, and might have persuaded Israel to pull out of Lebanon in concert with Syria.

Syria began to rearm. A £1.5 billion arms deal was struck with Russia, including new advanced surface-to-air missiles, a computerised ground control system, more artillery and tanks. Russia also sent 7,000 military advisers and technicians. Syria then proceeded to rearm PLO guerrillas in the Bekaa Valley who were disenchanted with the moderating Arafat. Syria's own imperialist ambitions in the area consist of retrieving the Golan Heights from Israel and reestablishing the Lebanon as its traditional satrapy. Hafez al Assad, the Butcher of Hama (in April '81 when he turned his Bedouin troops on Palestinian refugee camps in the West Bank), simply wants to be Godfather of the Arab world.

On May 17th 1983, an Israel-Lebanon accord was concluded seeking the withdrawal of the Israeli army in return for guarantees of Israel's border security. This deal was based on the assumption that the Lebanese army was strong enough to occupy the zone to be vacated by the Israeli army. This would depend on the government's ability to present its armed forces as a truly 'national', as opposed to merely factional body. But the Maronite faction of the Lebanese bourgeoisie had made no concessions to the disenfranchised Shi'ite Muslims and Druze; nor had the Syrians been consulted. The central government continued to be locked into the 1943 political covenant, which legally guaranteed Christian predominance, something which no longer reflected population realities. Syria began to supply arms to those disgruntled groups excluded from representation. The Lebanese opposition demanded its 'fair share' of state power and the profits from commerce, finance etc. that this might bring. This prospect, dressed up in religious sanctimony, 'self-determination' or whatever, is, in truth, what the Shiite militiamen of Nabih Berri's Amal, and Druze fighters of Walid Jumblatt's 'Progressive Socialist Party', have been fighting and dying for. From an article in the New York Times, February 9th 1984, we find the following lines:

"The security committee statement issued over the state run Beirut radio, now under the influence of the bands of West Beirut militias, also declared that as of Thursday (Feb. 9th) "all police duties in West Beirut will be handled by remaining elements of the Government's internal security force". It warned gunmen against any violation of private property or theft of government or army equipment."

Such are the radical politics of the National Salvation Front!

In September, Begin retired and was replaced as Israeli prime minister by fellow Irgun terrorist Yitzhak Shamir. As their occupation army continued to take casualties from guerilla assaults, the Labour Party and 'Peace Now' opposition made headway. The economy was in a shambles; inflation ran at 140% during 1983, the foreign debt was 22 billion dollars, and social benefits were slashed by 950 million dollars. Strikes within the country were intensifying and the Shamir government, recognising its inability to justify its military occupation in the light of domestic austerity and the workers' response to it, was forced to withdraw its troops south from the Shouf mountains to the Awali River. This left the Christian Phalange/Lebanese army and the Druze militias to fight it out for control of the Shouf area.

It was during this period that U.S. naval gunfire was first used on behalf of the Gemayel government. On October 23rd, 1983 the Americans and French marines paid the price for these overt acts of belligerence in the civil war: 300 lay dead after a suicide truck bombing. Reagan's immediate response was to raise the stakes dramatically: stability in Lebanon, he said, 'is central to (American) credibility on a global scale'. But at the peace talks which began in November at Vienna, the Christian faction still made no effective concessions to their Muslim and Druze adversaries. Again, the Reagan administration failed to press home the need for its Maronite allies to broaden the base of the regime.

Also in November, the mutinies by supporters of Fateh, the majority party of the PLO (see inset), turned into open rebellion. Led by Abu Saleh and Abu Musa, and with material and propaganda support from Syria and Libya, the rebels succeeded in pushing Arafat's irregulars out of the Ba'aa Valley and back to the northern Lebanese port of Tripoli. Again, Arafat was saved only by his new Western bloc friends—in this instance, Greece and France.

So the 'Peacekeeping Force' left Beirut in total disarray, abandoning their former positions to the Shia militias. The British made off so fast that they left two lorries on the quayside at Jounieh, the keys still in the ignition. American credibility was also forgotten in the rush to get out. And, as the recent events in Lebanon undoubtedly represent a... guerilla organisations could not point to any important successes, they could not be tarnished with the same accusations of ineptitude directed against the regular armies.

Al-Fatah now picked its moment to confront the PLO with a united front of the guerilla armies. A meeting between the PLO, Fatah, and George Habash’s Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, in Beirut, March 1968, agreed that the commandos should have half the seats in a new PNC.

Having secured these concessions, al-Fatah then turned against the PFLP, accusing its forces of having deserted the field at the battle of Karamah. By February 1969 the formal leadership of the PLO was in the hands of the commandos, with al-Fatah the dominant voice in the PNC and its leader, Yasser Arafat, elected chairman of the new executive.

Arafat’s strategy had been brilliant, bearing the hallmarks of a backstabbing statesman of international stature, fronted by a rhetoric which knew exactly when to be ‘militant’ and when to be ‘practical’. At the PNC’s fourth session in July 1968 Fatah attacked the autocratic power of the chairman which had characterised the PLO under Shuqairi, and succeeded in making the executive subordinate to the legislature (PNC) in the classic style of bourgeois representative democracy. But, having outbid the other commando groups, Fatah’s domination of the PNC guaranteed Arafat’s supremacy, and power far in excess of the old guard.

The jealousies and rivalries he generated may have returned to haunt Arafat, but for the time being the new-found radicalism in opposition of George Habash and co. rang hollow, after their dealings with the pre-1968 leadership. Fatah had adopted a Marxist ideology at its conference in August 1968, when Habash was in prison, but he could not prevent breakaways by more ‘radical’ groups, some of which embraced Trotskyism as well as ultra-nationalism. The PFLP forms the main opposition to Fatah in the PLO.

Since its establishment, the PLO has attained an institutional sophistication comparable to any small state. Like other states, its stability is built upon its ‘legitimacy’ in the eyes of the people it claims to represent. This allows it to tax Palestinians in friendly Arab countries, and enforce ‘contributions’ elsewhere. These financial resources are administered by the ‘Palestine National Fund’, or Treasury, to pay for the standing army (PLA) – the guerilla units continue to act autonomously – and the PLO’s educational, medical and propagandist activities.

Although the Palestinians are frequently referred to as a ‘nation without a territory’, the PLO operates in much the same way as any other state, in the areas where it holds sway. This has often drawn it into conflict with the local establishment, in Lebanon, Jordan and elsewhere, which has perceived a threat to its own institutions of state.

The recent talks between King Hussein of Jordan and Yasser Arafat, following the recall of the Jordanian parliament including its West Bank M.P.s, raises once more the possibility of a new Western initiative built around the ‘moderate’ Arab states. King Hussein has made it clear that he would be prepared to make concessions to a new Labour administration in Israel, in return for progress on the West Bank after the coming elections. With his own electoral prospects to worry about, Reagan is not yet ready to put the Jewish vote in jeopardy by responding to the hints from Amman in person. But with no less a personage than the Old Bag of Windsor to run his diplomatic errands, the message should have got through.

So long as they remain passive, or dominated by bourgeois politics, proletarians will remain the objects of history, unable to shape their own destiny, in the Middle East as elsewhere. But there is much to learn about the nature of bourgeois politics in a country such as the Lebanon, where the political processes of bourgeois democracy are not established, and the various political leaders are less able to cover up the jealousies and rivalries that go on in the name of ‘public service’. But so long as the reality of ‘living’ in the Lebanon is death, misery and terror, the television networks, as instruments of bourgeois domination and mystification par excellence, will continue to portray it all as something which should make us grateful for our own ‘peaceful’ alienation and democratic way of ‘life’ – something which, when it comes to it, will be really worth fighting and dying for.

WELCOME TO BRITAIN!

REAGAN IS coming to town on June 7. Which means one thing is certain - there will be more huff, puff and guff from the "opposition" than if the devil announced he was weekending in Salt Lake City.

The Labour Party and its leftist hangers on will be demanding an end to the reactionary F.agan-Thatcher Axis, and the senseless dogmas of Monetarism, which are destroying our vital industries, the lifeblood of the nation we hold so dear.

The Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament will be pulling out its big guns for the occasion. They intend to tell Reagan, in no uncertain terms, that unless he takes his cruise missiles back with him, there will be BIG trouble. Didn't he know that Britons never, never shall be slaves? Yes, the mass die-ins will go on until the message sinks through his thick head that nuclear war is not a good thing.

We, too, say quite unreservedly, that we are not happy to see Reagan. "But what is this?" you ask. "Has Workers' Playtime finally gone soft in the head? Have they abandoned their incisive proletarian critique and thrown in their lot with the left? Don't they know that Reagan is simply a figurehead for the U.S. and western imperialism?"

The answer is that we want to see Reagan (and the other world leaders, including socialists like Mitterrand and Craxi) get the only welcome they deserve: NOT one of protest, but one of outright hostility. Our answer is that no bourgeois politician, let alone those at the top of the pyramid, should feel free to travel anywhere unmolested and unthreatened.

But this does not place us alongside the miserable band of leftist hacks or the ranks of grubby peaceaniks.

The left deliberately concentrates its attacks on figureheads such as Reagan. The intention is to impress on people the idea that Reagan is the only problem, American imperialism is the only imperialism, and western or U.S. backed capitalism is the only capitalism. This is hardly surprising.

The Labour Party wants us to believe that electing a government ideologically opposed to Thatcher and Reagan (i.e., a Labour government) is the way to fight capitalism. Labour's leftist allies may only give "critical" or "conditional" support to this great project, but they too bolster this socialist reformism. Their argument is that Thatcherism/Reaganism represents a creeping fascism, and that the fight for socialism begins with the defence of democracy. And so their anti-Reaganism ends up being another line of defence for capitalism, an alternative ideology to defend our misery and exploitation.

CND likes to portray Reagan as the macho cowboy who thinks he can ride into Europe for the big shoot-out. But they are the prisoners of their own phony imagery. They merely want to update the cinema cliche, so that the tough guy gets put in his place with a few moral platitudes.

BEYOND ANTI-REAGANISM: ANTI-CAPITALISM

Yet these summits are a suitable target for our anger. From June 7-9 they will be telling US that the major western industrialised powers have come through the recession, and that prosperity is around the corner. They will be telling EACH OTHER that they need one last effort, and the balance of class forces will be turned decisively against the proletariat. They will be telling US that the west has closed ranks against the “Evil Empire”, and peace through strength is guaranteed. But they will be telling EACH OTHER that if there is a major hitch to their projected economic upturn, the war machine is in good running order.

And so, wearing our heaviest steel-capped boots, let's kick shit out of this summer picnic. It's not our moral outrage we want to impress on "our leaders", just the tread of our footwear. Our message should not be for the politicians, but for our fellow proletarians internationally - that we are taking up the fight. For the world's premiers and heads of state, we have only one thing to say: GET CANCER YOU SLAGS.
