Brecht somewhere remarks that “the formation of intellectuals is a long and difficult process, and sorely tries the patience of the masses.” This book began as a doctoral dissertation, and its writing has thus been an integral part of my formation as an intellectual. The process has undoubtedly tried the patience of many individuals and collectives, who have, nevertheless, unstintingly contributed to it.

Foremost amongst these is Rick Gruneau, who, as my doctoral supervisor, allowed me the latitude to follow my interests, offered insightful criticism, and had the generosity of spirit to support a dissertation some of whose specific arguments he disagreed with. Other faculty members at Simon Fraser University also strongly influenced the project, without bearing responsibility for its outcome. Chin Bannerjee’s course on Lukacs, interrupted as it was by a campus strike, set the political ball rolling a long time ago. Michael Lebowitz’s profound lectures on Capital and Grundrisse showed me what Marxism could, and should, be.

Two great teachers now, alas, gone to glory, deeply marked my thinking about the issues discussed here. Margaret Benston introduced me to cyberspace, but, much more importantly, gave me an enduring example of warmth and intelligence on the left before her tragically early death. Dallas Smythe, whose writings I had long admired, did me the honour of reading a draft chapter and discussing it one memorable afternoon very shortly before he passed away. If these pages contain anything worthy of such mentors, scholars and revolutionaries both, then I regard the writing time as well spent.

My friends and fellow doctoral students Dorothy Kidd and Santiago Valles played a very special role in the production of this book. They read and commented on nearly every chapter. They also allowed me to read their own work-in-process: since we all, while following different lines of inquiry, draw on a common set of sources and traditions, this was enormously enriching. We discussed what was at stake in scores of conversations. Dorothy and Santiago both supported me firmly. Each of them challenged me creatively on crucial issues--Dorothy on the history of radio, video and on gender, Santiago on slavery, the international division of labour, and war. In different ways, they made inroads on the characteristic thought-patterns of an author who remains irredeemably white and male. I cannot pretend to have responded adequately to all the issues they raised. But I can thank them for a rare experience of academic and political comradeship.

There are many others in Vancouver and at Simon Fraser University who contributed their time, their insight or their experience to this work. Salutations, across the gulf of time, tragedy, and new beginnings, to Colleen Wood, who survived the early stages of its composition. Thanks to the members of the Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 2396, especially Laurine Harrison, Steven Howard and Rhonda Spence, with whom I learned, through trial and much error, some political lessons indirectly reflected in the text. Thanks also to Bob Everton, for friendship when it was most needed, and for an inspiring political commitment; to Sue Cox, for several excellent conversations about technology theory; and to Sid Shniad, researcher for the British Columbia Telecommunications Workers' Union, whose ceaseless circulation of electronic information was not only practically useful, but also gratifyingly exemplified some of my arguments about the subversive potential of labour in the networks.

I owe a great debt to many in the international network of autonomist Marxists: to Ed Emery, for keeping an extraordinary archive, and for his invaluable translation work; to Harry Cleaver, for so many insights and provocations; to Massimo De Angelis, for several rewarding exchanges. Thanks also to those with whom I have had discussions on-line, but not yet in person, especially Steve Wright and Michael Hardt. Thanks too to the various members of what was once the Vancouver InfraReds Collective, now gradually dispersing to the four corners of the world, especially to Conrad and Jennifer Herold, Julian Prior and T.J.

Finally, in a class quite of their own, are the thanks due to my dear wife, Anne-- whose cool composure has often saved me from recalcitrant computers; whose combination of spiritual insight and social activism has so deeply instructed me; and whose sweet companionship is a constant incentive to struggle for the shortening of the working day.
